VICTIMS OF CRIME: AN OVERVIEW

Introduction

In the United States in any given year, approximately 6 million people will be raped, robbed, or assaulted; an estimated 21,000 will be murdered. In 1985, Americans were victims of crime at least 35 million times, including property crimes such as motor vehicle theft, personal larcencies, and household burglaries, according to the National Crime Survey of the Department of Justice. The economic toll of crime is staggering--in 1984, crime cost its victims more than $12 billion, including losses from property theft or damage, cash losses, medical expenses, and other crime-related costs.

The magnitude of the cost of crime is not surprising when one considers that approximately nine out of ten household crimes resulted in economic losses.

There was no recovery in 83% of personal crimes of theft, 89% of burglaries and 86% of household larcenies, leaving the financial costs of crime to be borne principally by its victims.

But these sobering statistics alone do not tell the entire story, for each victimization carries with it a story of tragic loss, whether it be of a loved one, a sense of safety or security, control over one's life, or valued possessions. Each number represents an individual, with family, friends, and co-workers -- the family forever shattered by the loss of a child, parent, spouse or sibling after a senseless murder, the worker deprived of transportation to work and thus a livelihood after his car is stolen, the elderly person trapped at home in fear because of a purse snatching. In the wake of a crime its tragic effects ripple through society. What happens to these victims? Where can they get help?

Not long ago, there were few answers to these questions. In the modern criminal justice system, the focus has been the apprehension, trial, and incarceration of the offender with emphasis on protecting the rights of the accused. Victims of crime are not party to criminal prosecutions, for in criminal matters the offense is viewed by the legal system as an offense against the peace and order of society rather than against the victims. As a result, the rights and feelings of victims were often ignored.

The ascendency of the victims' rights movement in the early 1970's brought the awareness that people victimized by crime are often again victimized by the criminal justice system. Factors contributing to dissatisfaction with the criminal justice system include:

- o Insensitive questioning:
- o Suggestions that the victim was somehow to blame for the crime:
- o Isolation from the process with no information concerning the progress of the case or location of the
- perpetrator; o Delays in return or loss of property kept as evidence;
- o Intimidation by the defendant;
- o Lost wages for time spent away from wc 'k through the various stages of the process:
- o Frustration and inconvenience of constant continuances in the case; o Lengthy and often fruitless waiting to appear in court;
- o Difficulty in finding parking and child care in order to come to court;
- o Anxiety about testifying and cross examination in open court.

The President's Task Force on Victims of Crime, a select committee appointed by President Reagan in 1982, determined that, with few exceptions, victims were either ignored by the criminal justice system or regarded only as another source of evidence without concern for their social, psychological, and financial needs after a crime.

Victims' Rights

Public awareness and legislative action in regard to the plight of victims is of relatively recent vintage. In 1976, the National Organization for Victim Assistance (NOVA) was created as an umbrella organization for the coordination of victim advocacy efforts nationwide. Since that time, the outcry from victims and concern on their behalf has led to the creation of a network of programs and a series of legal reforms designed to ease burden of crime.

Victims' rights include:

- o Participation in the criminal justice system;
- o Restitution, as ordered by the criminal court;
- o Compensation from a State-sponsored fund when restitution is not possible; o Freedom from intimidation or harassment;
- o Recovery of damages in a civil action against the criminal, accessories, or negligent third-party defendants; and o Sharing in the profits derived by the criminal for media depictions of the story (termed "Son-of-Sam laws").

Those concerned with victims' rights are also concerned with victims' needs, needs such as humane and sympathetic treatment, emergency services, and counselling that are not as readily satisfied by law or judicial reforms. To meet these needs, thousands of victim assistance programs have been established across the nation, under a variety of sponsorships. Thus, a vast network of concerned citizens, interested legislators, and victims themselves are beginning to turn rights into reality.

Legal Reforms

Lawmakers have focused on reforms in the criminal justice system to address many of the concerns expressed by victims and their advocates. In addition, Federal and State funding for victim assistance programs are now available to augment and support the victims' rights movement and assist victims in recovery, not only from a financial loss, but also from the psychological, emotional, and social traumas of victimization.

Federal Laws. On the Federal level, concern for the rights and treatment of victims of crime has been translated into action with recent reforms of the Federal criminal justice process and the renewal of grant programs for victim assistance projects.

The Victim and Witness Protection Act of 1982 guarantees a host of protections for victims and witnesses of Federal crimes and serves as a model for State and local governments. Specifically, this 1982 law:

o Requires the use of victim impact statements at sentencing; o Protects victims and witnesses from intimidation by strengthening criminal sanctions and creating civil remedies for victim/witness protection; o Permits Federal courts to order payment of restitution independently of a sentence of probation, with a requirement that the Court state its reasons on the record when restitution is not ordered; o Requires the Attorney General to develop and implement model guidelines

This Act also addressed the issue of exploitation for profit of the criminal's version of the story by requiring the Attorney General to report to Congress on the need for legislation to prevent Federal felons from profiting in this manner. Perhaps most importantly, this Act paved the way for even more sweeping changes two years later in the interest of victims' rights.

to assure the fair treatment of victims, and generally tightens bail laws.

The Victims of Crime Act of 1984 established a Crime Victims Fund through which disbursements of up to $100 million are made to support State victim compensation and State/local victim assistance programs. This Fund, administered by the Attorney General through the Office for Victims of Crime, uses monies collected from fines, special penalty assessments, and forfeited literary profits to finance these programs. Thus, financing for the Fund and the programs it supports comes from Federal criminals, and not Federal taxpayers.

Other provisions of this 1984 legislation created the special penalty assessments levied against all convicted Federal defendants and authorized U.S. attorneys to seek forfeiture of profits received by convicted violent criminals from sale of media rights to their stories. In addition, this Act affords victims the opportunity to make a statement at parole hearings concerning the financial, social, psychological, and emotional harm caused by the crime and holds U.S. Attorneys responsible for notification to victims of the dates of parole hearings.

The Victims of Crime Act is but one of the provisions of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, which brought major reforms throughout the Federal criminal justice system. Another of its provisions of interest to victims is the Justice Assistance Act of 1984. provision charges the Bureau of Justice Assistance (BJA), within the Department of Justice, with providing financial assistance and support to State and local justice system agencies and with establishing new block grant programs for States to improve the functioning of their criminal justice systems. The BJA has also launched demonstration projects in several communities that target family violence and child sexual abuse.

Another agency within the Department of Justice, the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, supports many programs to aid child victims of crime, as does the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect within the Department of Health and Human Services, whose grants, research, and demonstration projects focus on improving services to child abuse victims through State child protective service systems. Other Justice Department divisions with special victim-oriented mandates include the National Institute of Justice, which has established victims of crime as a major research priority, conducting more than 30 studies in the last 4 years, and the Bureau of Justice Statistics, which conducts the annual National Crime Survey and publishes regular reports on key criminal justice issues.

State Laws. In the majority of States, some type of legislative reform has been enacted in response to the cry of victims. As examined by the Bureau of Justice Statistics in Victim/Witness Legislation: An Overview (see bibliography), these laws address many of the issues concerning the legal system's treatment of victims and establish programs and services designed to aid crime victims.

These laws most commonly address:

Victim Compensation. At least 39
States, the District of Columbia and the Virgin Islands have enacted victim compensation laws which enable victims of violent crime and certain survivors of deceased victims to be compensated through special State funds for lost earnings, support, and other costs of crime such as medical expenses.

Restitution. Court orders requiring that the offender make restitution to the victim have long been within the discretion of sentencing courts, although perhaps seldom ordered. However, in order to increase the the number of restitution orders, some States have passed laws that require their courts or parole boards to order restitution to the victim in accordance with the offender's ability to pay.

Son-of-Sam Laws. Inspired by the public outrage when the "Son-of-Sam" killer who stalked New York City in 1977 received nearly $200,000 for the literary rights to his story, at least 22 States have enacted measures that provide crime victims with access to such revenues as another form of compensation.

Protection from Intimidation. As with the Federal law, some States have found that their provisions sanctioning the obstruction of justice, witness tampering, and intimidation were not adequate to protect victims and witnesses. To remedy these inadequecies, several recent laws broaden the class of persons protected under witness tampering and intimidation statutes, sanction a wide range of intimidating acts, and authorize criminal courts to issue protective orders for victims.

Victim Notification. Many States have enacted a variety of measures requiring official notification to victims concerning the availability of compensation programs, progress and postponements of the case, the right to be heard at sentencing and parole hearings, and release of the offender from custody.

Victim Impact Statements. At least 33 States have laws designed to inform the sentencing court of the crime's impact on the victim, often through victim impact statements routinely included in the presentence report used by the court to determine sentence. Victims also may have a voice in other stages of the criminal justice process, as in States that allow the victim to submit a written statement or be heard at parole hearings, or to comment on proposed plea bargains or admissions to pretrial intervention programs.

In addition to these statutes, various other measures have been enacted to assist victims. A few States have enacted legislation protecting the jobs of victims participating in criminal proceedings by encouraging officials to explain to employers the need for absences because of court appearances, or by levying fines and other sanctions against employers who interfere with the employee-victim's participation in the judicial process. Some States have also enacted laws that expedite the return of property taken as evidence, and laws that establish ombudsmen and support attendants for victims involved with the courts.

Where to Find Help

Depending upon the type of assistance needed, local prosecutors, police, social service agencies, and mental health centers are all possible sources of information and referral. The National Victims Resource Center includes a database containing the names, addresses and descriptions of more than 1,400 victim assistance programs nationwide.

In addition, many localities have established victim assistance programs to provide emergency services, crisis intervention, counseling, advocacy and other services in the aftermath of crime. These programs are under a variety of sponsorships, including local prosecutors offices, social service agencies, and private organizations. Self-help programs or support groups for those with common experiences are another source of assistance for victims, with such groups as Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD) having chapters in virtually every section of the country. Included in this report are four appendixes: Appendix A lists victims advocacy and support groups; Appendix B lists State victim compensation and assistance coordinators; Appendix C lists Federal victim/witness coordinators in the U.S. Attorney's Office; and Appendix D is a bibliography of the references used in this report, and contains additional readings for further information.
