Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention

The Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) was established by the President and Congress through the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (JJDP) Act of 1974, Public Law 93-415, as amended. Located within the Office of Justice Programs of the U.S. Department of Justice, OJJDP's goal is to provide national leadership in addressing the issues of juvenile delinquency and improving juvenile justice.

OJJDP sponsors a broad array of research, program, and training initiatives to improve the juvenile justice system as a whole, as well as to benefit individual youth-serving agencies. These initiatives are carried out by seven components within OJJDP, described below.

Research and Program Development Division develops knowledge on national trends in juvenile delinquency; supports a program for data collection and information sharing that incorporates elements of statistical and systems development; identifies how delinquency develops and the best methods for its prevention, intervention, and treatment; and analyzes practices and trends in the juvenile justice system.

Training and Technical Assistance Division provides juvenile justice training and technical assistance to Federal, State, and local governments; law enforcement, judiciary, and corrections personnel; and private agencies, educational institutions, and community organizations.

Special Emphasis Division provides discretionary funds to public and private agencies, organizations, and individuals to replicate tested approaches to delinquency prevention, treatment, and control in such pertinent areas as chronic juvenile offenders, community-based sanctions, and the disproportionate representation of minorities in the juvenile justice system.

State Relations and Assistance Division supports collaborative efforts by States to carry out the mandates of the JJDP Act by providing formula grant funds to States; furnishing technical assistance to States, local governments, and private agencies; and monitoring State compliance with the JJDP Act.

Information Dissemination and Planning Unit informs individuals and organizations of OJJDP initiatives; disseminates information on juvenile justice, delinquency prevention, and missing children; and coordinates program planning efforts within OJJDP. The unit's activities include publishing research and statistical reports, bulletins, and other documents, as well as overseeing the operations of the Juvenile Justice Clearinghouse.

Concentration of Federal Efforts Program promotes interagency cooperation and coordination among Federal agencies with responsibilities in the area of juvenile justice. The program primarily carries out this responsibility through the Coordinating Council on Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, an independent body within the executive branch that was established by Congress through the JJDP Act.

Missing and Exploited Children Program seeks to promote effective policies and procedures for addressing the problem of missing and exploited children. Established by the Missing Children's Assistance Act of 1984, the program provides funds for a variety of activities to support and coordinate a network of resources such as the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children; training and technical assistance to a network of 43 State clearinghouses, nonprofit organizations, law enforcement personnel, and attorneys; and research and demonstration programs.

OJJDP provides leadership, direction, and resources to the juvenile justice community to help prevent and control delinquency throughout the country.

Foreword

In the 1970's, the message issued by the research community concerning the use of prevention and treatment programs for juveniles was that "nothing works." This unfortunate and, as it turned out, erroneous conclusion, together with increasing serious juvenile delinquency, fueled confinement of larger numbers of juveniles throughout the 1980's. Juveniles were increasingly turned over to the criminal courts. These trends continue to this day.

Now we find that treatment programs for juveniles do work—and were working all the while. This report, the initial publication of the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention's What Works series, describes a variety of successful prevention and treatment programs in the juvenile justice system. Compiled by the National Center for Juvenile Justice, it represents the results of a nationwide survey of 3,000 juvenile justice professionals, including juvenile and family court judges, court administrators, probation officers, and line staff. The respondents nominated over 1,100 programs they deemed effective in their jurisdiction. After careful review, 425 programs merited designation as promising interventions.

This compendium of successful programs should prove a valuable tool for juvenile justice professionals seeking appropriate prevention and treatment programs in order to deter future delinquency. According to a recent study, fewer juveniles (41 percent) returned to court on a second referral when an appropriate prevention or treatment program was initially chosen. To expedite your use of the information provided regarding these programs, a contact for further information accompanies the program description.

We hope this report assists you in addressing the needs of youth and enhancing the effectiveness of your juvenile justice system.

Introduction

The old notion that nothing works in juvenile justice has been challenged by new and growing research about what constitutes an effective program and development by juvenile courts and probation departments of programs that are making a difference. A single treatment modality, frequently the choice of reform schools of the past, has been replaced by broader and more comprehensive approaches to rehabilitation that consider the juvenile's needs, the safety of the community, and reparation of the victim. In addition, the perspective that treatment away from home is more effective than treatment near one's community has shifted. Statistics concerning intake decisions and subsequent juvenile court dispositions in 1991 reveals that about 60 percent of cases received probation, restitution, community service, or referrals to community programs instead of commitment to an institution (see Juvenile Court Statistics 1991). These contemporary approaches to juvenile rehabilitation represent an ideological shift of the juvenile justice system toward a more balanced approach and represent the importance of continuing to develop programs that work.

The What Works project was designed to document this variety of effective prevention and treatment programs in use around the country. In September 1992, the National Center for Juvenile Justice and the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges embarked on this task. We began a project to identify and assemble into a directory pertinent information available on effective prevention and treatment programs for juvenile offenders. Limited in our efforts to conduct an extensive evaluation of each program, we designed a research methodology that first identified essential components of effective programs including goals and objectives, community involvement, case management (assessment, treatment plan, interventions, and services), security and monitoring, behavior management (program and participant accountability), staff, an evaluation mechanism, and aftercare. We then asked 3,000 experienced judges, court administrators, and chief probation officers to nominate and rate programs they had recently used. We then sent surveys to the administrators of the nominated programs.

The result of our efforts comprises What Works, a program directory that contains 425 nationally nominated programs. Each entry in the directory contains the program name, contact person, address, target population, gender, age, program type, type of administration, structure, staff, per diem rates, annual budgets, evaluation date, program summary, and primary intervention. To enable a user to identify programs in a specific area, programs are grouped under the primary intervention of a program, such as academic education, behavior management, community service, sex offender treatment, and substance abuse education. An alphabetic listing and target population index are contained in the back of the document to help the reader identify specific programs and target populations. The What Works directory is intended to inform and assist practitioners with planning and developing a program of their own by providing the most significant and reliable information possible on effective prevention and treatment programs for juvenile offenders.

The contents of this directory are, in most instances, presented as they were submitted by program administrators. Only minor changes and revisions were made to enhance clarity or to classify a program. Additional information about each program may be obtained by contacting program administrators directly.

Summary: The Crisis Intervention Program operates through the Kent County Juvenile Court and provides short-term family counseling services to families of youth runaways, school failures and those who have committed minor law violations. A counselor assists a family in crisis by helping them cope with their problems and identifying resources to meet their needs. The goal of the program is to prevent youth from becoming a product of the system and to prevent them from being placed in an institution. The program provides up to 6 sessions per family.

Summary: The Maximum Supervision probation program is designed for offenders who have failed to meet conditions in another probation program and those who have committed new offenses. This program has three phases of contact between probationer and probation officer with each phase containing less contact. The maximum amount of contact is in Phase I where there are 3 contacts per week and 1 office visit. Phase II includes field visit and 1 office visit. Successful completion of Phase II allows youth to pass on to Phase III, a more traditional form of supervision with fewer contact. Home curfews, unannounced contacts and case management are components used to help probationers leave the program and gain self control.

Summary: Families Who Care is a foster care program which provides an alternative family living situation to youth in need. Youth are referred from juvenile court or are transferred from other Adelphoi Village units as service plans dictate. Individual case management is maintained for each youth and service plans are developed based on juvenile court recommendations, the natural or foster family and Adelphoi Village staff. Services include family counseling, support groups, and training. An independent living program can be implemented through an Individual Service Plan with county approval.
