Preface

Until recently, efforts to improve treatment services for abused and neglected children and their families have necessarily focused on upgrading and expanding the capabilities of paid staff. But led by the early efforts of pioneers in different parts of the nation, we are now witnessing a growing interest in the use of volunteers to provide important assistance to public and private agencies.

This booklet seeks to describe some of the most important aspects of this growing use of volunteers, as discerned from the National Center's Clearinghouse of Child Abuse and Neglect Programs.

Introduction: The Nature and Importance of Volunteers

The use of volunteers in social service programs is not a new phenomenon. Private agencies, especially nonprofit agencies, have traditionally made extensive use of volunteers, but public agencies have only recently begun to incorporate them into their staffs. Prior to the 1920s, volunteers not only lent their names to good causes as board members and fund-raisers, but were the providers of direct services to clients. With the increase of emphasis in social work on casework skills and professionalism, the role of volunteers in direct services to clients diminished.

Recently there has been a revival of interest in the use of volunteers in direct services, as well as some legislative recognition of the importance of voluntarism. The 1967 amendments to the Social Security Act required that all states move toward the use of nonpaid volunteers as a part of the service program to strengthen family life through a team approach to services.¹

Not all volunteer work is concerned with social problems. A 1974 survey by the Census Bureau showed that social and welfare work accounted for only 7% of volunteer work. Social and welfare activities were less popular with volunteers than were religious, education, health, civic/community action, citizenship, and recreational activities. In the same survey, it was found that during a typical week 34% of all volunteers were involved in giving direct services; 17% worked as group leaders, 13% as organizers, 8% as fund raisers, and 12% worked in clerical and other tasks. The remaining volunteers were engaged in religious activities.²

Recently, increasing numbers of abused and neglected children have come within the purview of social service agencies due to increased awareness and improved reporting procedures.³ Public awareness campaigns have attracted a number of potential volunteers who are concerned with the problem. It is not surprising, then, to find an expanding role for volunteers in child abuse and neglect programs.

Traditional Roles

Volunteers have traditionally served in child abuse and other social service programs in the following capacities:

- > driving and other nonspecialized functions
- > fund-raising
- > organizing and coordinating
- > education and public awareness
- > volunteer professionals

One typical use of volunteers is in roles which require little or no special skills or education. Volunteers with clerical skills are used to supplement the service staff in any program. Volunteers are also used to provide transportation to clients who might otherwise miss clinic and other important appointments. In programs which operate day care or nursery facilities, volunteers may take on nonspecialized tasks such as cleaning and cooking.⁴ In programs which serve abusive families, however, even such a simple task as providing transportation to and from a day care center may play an important role in the rehabilitative process for both parents and children.⁵ Here, an ability to demonstrate patience and gentleness with mothers who have difficulty having the children ready on time in the morning may be essential. The driver's relationship with the children is vital as well. The pick-up time is often stressful; it must be met by the driver with calm and understanding of the child's need for reassurance. This gives the child an opportunity to experience relationship with a mature adult ready and willing to meet his needs, as his parents are often unable to do.

Fund-raising is a traditional role for volunteers, and is especially crucial in programs which receive little or no public support. For example, at Casa de los Ninos, a temporary care facility in Tucson, Arizona, volunteers convinced local businesses, churches, service clubs, and individuals to donate a house and $165,000 in materials, money, and labor. This program is totally dependent on the community for its annual budget of $71,000.⁶ Most private child abuse programs receive at least some funding through charitable organizations in which volunteers participate in fund-raising. The Junior League, for example, committed $25,000 in operating expenses to the Shelter Home for abused children operated by Comprehensive Youth Services in Fresno, California.⁷ Volunteers also participated in direct fund-raising for this program by approaching service clubs and voluntary organizations. At the Child Abuse Prevention Effort (CAPE) in Philadelphia, a committee of volunteers was responsible for financial planning and allocation of funds, as well as preparing grant proposals. Recently, however, a full-time fund-raising coordinator has been hired to take over these functions.

Two functions frequently performed by volunteers which are closely related to fund-raising are organization and coordination. In many private, nonprofit programs all of the coordination and organization necessary for the inception and functioning of the program is done by volunteers. For example, in Parents Anonymous (PA), an all-volunteer self-help program for abusive parents, chapters are organized by volunteers, who then coordinate the efforts of other volunteers. Indeed, only volunteers may organize PA chapters: the PA Chapter Development Manual states that "a state, county or private agency or facility may not start a P.A. chapter. They may endorse and legitimize the need for P.A., they may refer members, they may support and encourage...but they may not start or be directly involved with the operations of a chapter." The rationale for this rule is that the exclusive use of volunteers is necessary to avoid the anti-agency feelings that many troubled parents have. Professional people may organize PA chapters, but only as volunteers, not as professionals affiliated with social service agencies, hospitals, or other organizations.⁸

Another kind of volunteer role concerned with organization and coordination is illustrated by the Children's Advocates program in Boston, Massachusetts. This is a volunteer organization which is not involved in direct services, but rather coordinates the efforts of local agencies involved in various aspects of child abuse and neglect.⁹

Education and public awareness represent another indirect service function in which volunteers may be effective. Public education, through speakers bureaus, conferences, and publications, is a major area of volunteer efforts. Lobbying for better child protection legislation, testifying at hearings, and studying and commenting on proposed laws are other volunteer roles. A good example of the efficacy of volunteers in increasing public awareness of child abuse and neglect can be found in the Danville (Va.) Committee for Child Protection. Both in the city of Danville and in the surrounding rural area, volunteers in this program have been educating the public through films, brochures, radio spots, and talks on the subject of child abuse and neglect.

9. National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect (NCCAN), Child Abuse and Neglect Programs (Springfield, Va.: National Technical Information Service, PB-253 650, June 1976), p. 2.

The 30-member group is composed almost entirely of young mothers. Since the fall of 1972, the Committee has held four large educational meetings open to anyone in the county, developed its own radio spots, and written and printed a brochure. The brochure is part of a kit given to all new mothers at the hospital, placed in hospital waiting rooms and doctors' offices, and distributed at meetings. The volunteers have handled over 100 speaking engagements; in rural areas, members have made presentations under the sponsorship of the PTA and the Rotary Club. Working closely with the city and county school boards, the Committee organized a meeting on the recognition of child abuse and neglect for teachers before the start of the school year. As a result of the Committee's work, a county multidisciplinary committee on child abuse was established, and the local hospital was the sixth in the state to adopt a specific policy on reporting child abuse and neglect.¹⁰ Reports of incidents of child abuse or neglect increased more than five-fold in the Danville area.¹¹

The involvement of professionals on a voluntary basis has been essential in many child abuse and neglect programs. Indeed, concerned professionals are often the catalyst in the formation of child abuse and neglect programs. They may act as consultants, provide training for volunteers and lay therapists, engage in public awareness activities, or become involved in the coordination of services and agencies. Parents Anonymous uses volunteer professionals not only as organizers, but also as advisors and sponsors. Social workers, psychologists, nurses, ministers, and others act as resource people, assisting the PA chairperson in group techniques and locating resources in the community. Over 1,000 volunteer professionals have been involved in the past six years in PA. Volunteer professionals have also been active in stimulating the local public support that leads to the creation of a PA chapter.¹²

Children's Advocates, mentioned previously, was formed by a group of professionals from agencies involved with child abuse and neglect in response to the lack of coordination of child protective services they saw in the Boston area. The group incorporated in 1972 and its membership represents 30 local agencies, hospitals, and organizations. Children's Advocates organized the Boston chapter of PA and is now in the process of developing a hotline for abusive parents and a directory of local services. It operates a speakers bureau and has an active legislative committee that follows child welfare legislation and keeps the membership informed.¹³

Casa de los Ninos, mentioned above, is an example of the use of volunteer professionals in a direct service capacity. Volunteer registered nurses staff the facility during the day shift while paid nurses work the night shift. One nurse is assigned to each shift and is responsible for the two to eight volunteer nonprofessionals working with her. About 65 professional nurses are involved in the program.

Professionals, especially physicians, can be an important asset to a program in terms of access to resources and credibility. The authority of a physician can be invaluable in public awareness activities and in lobbying and testifying at legislative hearings.

Innovative Roles

A number of new roles for volunteers have been developed in child abuse and neglect programs in recent years, including the following:

- > parent-aides
- > lay therapists
- > providers of direct services to children
- > surrogate parents

Abusive families have been characterized as families which are isolated socially, which lack the supportive network of friends and family that typifies most normal families. Often the parents are incapable of taking advantage of the services available in the community.¹⁴ Moreover, they have an overwhelming need for warmth and support which blinds them to the needs of their children. Well-trained, carefully selected volunteers can be used in a variety of direct service roles in the treatment of these families. Mature adults willing to work with abusive families can be found in nearly every community. Empathy, gentleness, patience, and the basic capacity to love are important; having lived through the difficult experiences which come with marriage and parenting is often an invaluable asset.

Although emotional stability, warmth, openness, and reliability are desirable qualities in volunteer personnel, training is also essential for those who work directly with abusive parents. In a program at the Bernalillo County (New Mexico) Mental Health and Mental Retardation Center, volunteers who were to serve as parent aides in the treatment of abusive families participated in four three-hour training sessions.¹⁵ Training emphasized knowledge of the social, medical, and legal aspects of child abuse and neglect; the characteristics of the abusing parent; and the development of interpersonal skills and skill in applying various treatment techniques. Training curricula from other programs emphasize the development of skills in interviewing, observation, identification of stressful areas in family life, and focusing on the parent-child relationship; identification and use of community resources; and the development of self-awareness in the helping relationship.¹⁶

Trained volunteers have been found to be important assets working directly with the abusive family, allowing the caseworker to concentrate his skills on problem-solving while the family receives support from the volunteer. Caseworkers, especially those in public agencies, rarely have time to give intensive supportive care to their clients; it is this type of care that abusive parents typically need, and that volunteers can supply. For example, in a program run by the Pediatric Service at Colorado General Hospital, volunteers trained as parent aides and assigned to abusive families were urged to ask the parents for a cup of coffee or tea and sit in the kitchen, to pay little attention to the children, and to listen with interest to the problems of the parents. These volunteers were matched as closely as possible to the abusive families by social and economic class.¹⁷ Much of the work of parent aides involves helping parents to use other community resources of which they themselves may have taken advantage at one time. Other services included helping with clinic appointments and with shopping.

Volunteers trained as lay therapists serve as nonjudgmental, nonauthoritative counselors for abusive parents, often on a crisis intervention basis. In such programs, contacts are often made by telephone; for example, child abuse helplines employ volunteers in the capacity of lay therapists. In other programs, lay therapists are involved with families over a much longer period. The ideal therapist, according to Kempe and Helfer, is one who is prepared to become meaningfully involved in the lives of abusive parents over a period of eight to twelve months.¹⁸

17. C. H. Kempe and R. E. Helfer, "Innovative Therapeutic Approaches," in Helping the Battered Child and His Family, ed. C. H. Kempe and R. E. Helfer (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1972), p. 43.

Volunteers may also help in the treatment of abusive families through their involvement in direct services to children. Crisis nurseries manned by volunteers can provide a warm environment for children during crisis periods. Because the risk of abuse is high during family crises, these nurseries can be crucial in preventing abuse. Another use of volunteers in direct service to children is found in a unique program called the "emergency parent" program.¹⁹ Here, volunteers equipped with an emergency kit which includes blankets, food, cooking equipment, and other items are dispatched on a crisis intervention basis to the home. Their primary function is to protect children in their own homes. Volunteers have also been used in hospital-based programs to provide physical contact and "cuddling" to hospitalized abused children.²⁰

Through their relationship with abusive parents, which is typified by nonjudgemental concern, volunteers provide the parents with something they lacked as children, and in effect become surrogate parents. This function can be important in effecting change in the parent-child relationship, which is often characterized by the parents' expecting the children to meet their emotional needs.²¹ The relationship of the lay therapist/parent aide to the parents also provides a positive role model for the parents by showing them new ways of relating to their children.

Conclusions

The evaluation of volunteers in child abuse and neglect programs, like the evaluation of the programs themselves, is a difficult matter. There are a number of indirect effects of volunteer involvement which must be considered, in addition to the direct contributions volunteers can make in a service program. For example, the satisfaction gained by the volunteer through his work is often reflected by professional staff, who find encouragement in the knowledge that they have allies in their efforts to intervene in neglect and abuse situations. Volunteers often help to keep the professional in touch with the community and the community conscience. In one program an improvement of relations between the community and the agency was found to be an unanticipated benefit of the use of volunteers. As the volunteers gained a better understanding of the agency's function and problems, they passed that understanding along to the community by word of mouth.²² This is a significant benefit at a time when welfare agencies are facing a battle for public acceptance.

By virtue of their unpaid status and their nonauthoritative position within the agency, volunteers in protective service agencies may be able to form relationships with abuse and neglect parents which are not possible for the caseworker. The client can readily accept that the volunteer is involved because he or she cares, and can identify the volunteer as an ally. The volunteer does not have the apparent authority or control over the client's life inherent in the caseworker's role and therefore is less likely to be perceived in a threatening light. The volunteer can become a safe person to whom the client can express his or her anger and fears about the agency, the worker, and the situation. As both a friend to the client and a part of the agency, the volunteer becomes a means by which the client relates to the agency and the caseworker in a less threatening atmosphere.

Because no data exist on the productivity of volunteers, coordinators and directors of selected volunteer programs were asked to give their opinions on this subject during recent interviews.²³ Volunteers were generally reported to be reliable, hard-working, and enthusiastic. In programs where volunteers supplemented paid service workers, the enthusiasm of the volunteers was often a boost to the morale of the staff.

23. Personal communications to Richard A. Roth, Herner and Company, Washington, D.C. For a list of persons and programs contacted, see Appendix I.

The use of volunteers is not without its problems, however. Regular agency staffs sometimes resist the use of volunteers to supplement service workers or to do more than transport children to doctor's appointments. Child welfare workers in some programs may be threatened by the thought that a nonprofessional could perform functions that the welfare workers feel requires professional expertise. Again, among the lower levels of employees, insecurity and fear of job loss tend to make the volunteer threatening. Also, there may be a wide cultural gap, particularly in the area of child-rearing practices: sometimes volunteers are better educated and in a higher socioeconomic bracket than the staff assigned to supervise them.

The decision on whether to use volunteers in any capacity must be based on the needs of the particular program. Despite the potential problems in their use, there is no doubt that volunteers have a unique and valuable contribution to make to child abuse and neglect programs.
