Programs:

This correctional center was planned to meet the needs of inmates who require maximum security and who have not responded to treatment programs in other institutions. There will be a continual striving for individualization of programs. As far as possible, individual programs will depend on the inmate's behavior so that each can know what behavior must be improved. The program of reintegration into the community will begin with transfers to other correctional facilities, and it is from there the inmate usually will be released into society.

Generally, the children are under observation and study at the center for four to six weeks. Each child receives psychological testing and some limited psychiatric evaluation, and casework study and evaluation is performed by the child welfare staff. The object of the evaluation is to determine the causes of the child's misbehavior, to help him understand those causes and to attempt to foster in him a desire for a better social adjustment. Placements are made to other state-operated juvenile institutions, community youth homes, foster homes, private boarding schools, state mental hospitals, schools for the mentally retarded, maternity homes and vocational schools.
