Combatting Terrorism: American Policy and Organization

by Ambassador Robert M. Sayre

*Address before the Third International Civil Aviation Security Conference
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1982*

The French Embassy in Beirut was destroyed by a car bomb on December 17, 1981. 20 people were killed and another 100 were injured.

Political violence and terrorism are not new. They have been with us since the dawn of recorded history. What is new is the speed with which people and ideas move. You can be in Washington tonight and Paris tomorrow morning. You can sit at your television set and have a front-row seat at the world soccer matches in Madrid. An assassin can attempt to kill the President of the United States on the streets in Washington or the Pope on the streets in Rome, and the television networks will bring the event to you simultaneously and in living color. Political terrorism used to be a national event that seldom had ramifications beyond national borders. Now any attack against any prominent figure or against a commercial aircraft or against an embassy is an international media event. Our ability to travel and communicate rapidly has made it so. Terrorism is international, and, as many say, it is theater.

I would like to be able to tell you that we are doing as well on controlling political violence generally as you are doing in controlling terrorist attacks against commercial aviation. But you are, in a sense, fortunate because you can put people and baggage through a single checkpoint. You can, of course, still be and are the victim of human errors and poor procedures. You have done a remarkable job, at considerable expense, to maintain your safety record.

Unfortunately this is not the case for political violence and terrorism generally. We have no way of running all terrorists through a checkpoint or x-raying their baggage. Their methods of attack are myriad, they are clandestine, and they are elusive. They frequently change the names of their organizations and their passports, recruit new faces, send old faces off to different parts of the world, and generally try to confound and confuse the police and security organizations that governments create as defensive mechanisms.

The number of actual terrorist acts increases daily. Every day that passes brings to my desk in the Department of State a new batch of reports about planned terrorist attacks or attacks actually carried out. Diplomats are once again the principal target; and American diplomats are particularly high on the list of victims or intended victims. Some 15% of the operating budget of the Department of State goes to pay for protection of our personnel and facilities overseas, and the cost is rising. So while I would like to tell you that the situation is getting better, I must honestly and candidly tell you that it is getting worse. What are we doing about it?

In truth our problems are not that much different from yours. We have a worldwide operating network and so do the airlines. The difference may be that we are in almost every country, sometimes in several places, whereas your networks are not as extensive. That is a difference in degree and not substance.

We must have an international consensus, and cooperation on security threats to our operation, and so must you.

We must have an understanding with individual governments on how terrorist attacks against us will be handled and so must you. There must be an understanding within our organizations from the President to the security man in the field on how we will react, both in a policy and operational sense, and I am certain that is the case with the airlines.

American Policy

The first action required of the Reagan Administration was a clear and unequivocal statement of policy.

At the very beginning of this Administration, President Reagan, in welcoming the Tehran hostages home, articulated U.S. policy on terrorism. He said: "Let terrorists be aware that when the rules of international behavior are violated, our policy will be one of swift and effective retribution."

We have publicly and repeatedly noted that the United States, when faced with an act of terrorism at home or abroad, will take all possible lawful measures to resolve the incident and to bring to justice the perpetrators of the crime. This policy is based upon the conviction that to allow terrorists to succeed only leads to more terrorism; if they are successful, they will be encouraged to commit more such acts.

We firmly believe that terrorists should be denied benefits from acts such as hostage-holding or kidnapping; thus the U.S. Government does not make concessions to blackmail. We will not pay ransom or release prisoners in response to such demands.

When a terrorist incident occurs outside the United States, we look to the host government to exercise its responsibility to protect persons within its jurisdiction and to enforce the law in its territory. During such incidents, we consult closely with the responsible government, and we offer all practical support to the government concerned.

When a terrorist incident against us is sponsored or directed by a nation, as an instrument of its own policy in an attempt to intimidate or coerce us, we will take all appropriate measures—be they diplomatic, political, economic, or military—to resolve the incident and to resist this form of international blackmail. So the United States has a clearly stated policy.

Director, Office for Combatting Terrorism

Ambassador Robert M. Sayre became the Director of the Department of State's Office for Combatting Terrorism in May 1982. He is also chairman of the Department's policy group on security policies and programs and contingency planning.

Mr. Sayre was born in Hillsboro, Oregon, on August 18, 1924. He received a bachelor's degree from Willamette (1949), a doctorate in law from George Washington University (1956), a master's degree from Stanford (1960), and an honorary doctorate in laws from Willamette (1966).

He joined the Department in 1949 as an intern. He later held assignments as international economist in the Bureau of Economic Affairs and the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs (1950-52), international relations officer in the latter bureau (1952-56), officer in charge of inter-American security and military assistance affairs (1956-57), chief of the political section in Lima (1957-60), and financial officer in Havana (1960-61).

He returned to Washington in 1961 to become President Kennedy's executive secretary of the task force on Latin America and also assisted in efforts that put together the Alliance for Progress. Other positions Ambassador Sayre has held have been officer in charge of Mexican affairs (1961-64), senior staff member of the National Security Council (1964-65), Deputy Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs (1965-67), Acting Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Af-

But a policy is no better than the determination or will to carry it out and the organization established to do so. The problem is international, so the first question is, how effective and determined is the international community?

International Cooperation

International organizations, including the United Nations, have sponsored a number of multilateral conventions which deal with particular terrorist crimes to bring them within the criminal law. The United States has strongly supported these efforts over the years.

The most widely accepted conventions are The Hague convention against hijacking and the Montreal convention against aircraft sabotage, which are now adhered to by over 100 states. The international community, through these conventions, has established the principle that aircraft piracy and sabotage, like the maritime piracy they so closely resemble, are universally abhorred international crimes.

Other conventions dealing with additional aspects of the terrorism problem are the New York convention on crimes against internationally protected persons, the Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, and the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Materials. These agreements establish the obligation among states party to them to submit for prosecution or extradition those alleged to have committed particular crimes.

The United States strongly supports the principle established in these conventions that those who commit terrorist crimes should be brought to justice in accordance with the law, and we continue to urge other nations to become parties to these important agreements.

The United Nations has also considered the effectiveness of the New York convention on attacks against diplomats and other internationally protected persons. The Secretary General has invited member states to submit reports this year for consideration by the United Nations on actions they have taken to carry out the convention. We welcome this continuing focus on attacks on diplomats which now account for more than half of all terrorist attacks.

In addition to these efforts in the international organizations, the economic summit seven—the United States, Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, the United Kingdom, and Japan—enunciated a course of action against hijacking. In 1978 the heads of state and government of these seven nations adopted a declaration against hijacking. It was a commitment to take joint action by terminating air service to states which fail to live up to their obligations under The Hague convention on hijackers. Last year the Bonn declaration was implemented against Afghanistan for its conduct during and subsequent to the hijacking of a Pakistani aircraft in March 1981. The

No Concessions!

The Reagan Administration has adopted a firm policy to combat international terrorism. We will resist terrorist blackmail and pursue terrorists with the full force of the law. We will not pay ransom, nor release prisoners, and we will not bargain for the release of hostages. To make concessions to terrorist blackmail only jeopardizes the lives and freedom of additional innocent people. We encourage other governments to take a similarly strong stance. When U.S. citizens are taken hostage, we look to the host government to exercise its responsibility under international law to protect them, but at the same time we urge the government not to give in to terrorist blackmail. We are prepared to assist the host government should our aid be requested.

The basic philosophy underlying this policy is that concessions to terrorists only serve to encourage them to resort to more terror to obtain their political objectives, thereby endangering still more innocent lives. If terrorists understand that a government steadfastly refuses to give in to their demands and is prepared to live up to its international obligations to prosecute or extradite them, this will serve as a strong deterrent. We also encourage other governments to adopt a no-concessions policy since international terrorism is a phenomenon which crosses national boundaries. Our no-concessions policy is of little avail if Americans are taken hostage abroad and the host government concedes to the terrorists demands.

The current policy in dealing with hostage incidents involving U.S. diplomats and other officials represents an evolution from the handling of the first incidents in 1969 and 1970. Although our policy was not to give in to terrorists demands, there is a feeling by those who have analyzed those cases that the principal concern then was the safe release of the hostages, and any host government concessions to the terrorists were acceptable if they contributed to that goal.

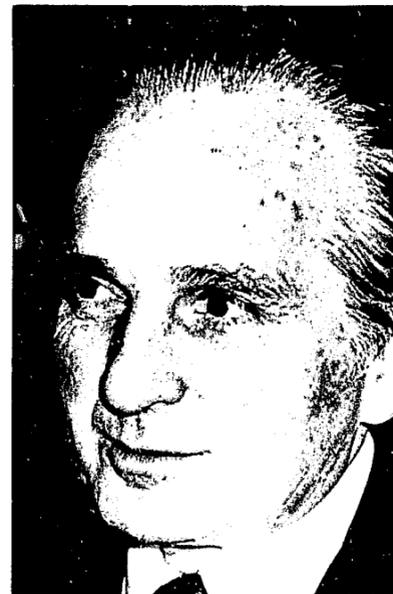

By the time the U.S. Ambassador in Haiti was kidnapped by local terrorists in January 1973 and the U.S. Ambassador and the Deputy Chief of Mission were held hostage in Khartoum in March 1973 by Palestinian terrorists, a considerable hardening in the U.S. policy was apparent. Although the Ambassador to Haiti was released after local authorities had made concessions to the terrorists, it is apparent that the United States had not been in favor of giving in to their demands. In connection with the Khartoum case, while it was still in progress, President Nixon said that "as far as the United States as a government giving in to blackmail demands, we cannot do so and we will not do so." He went on to say, "We will do everything that we can to get them released but we will not be blackmailed." One of the terrorist demands had been to release Sirhan Sirhan, the convicted assassin of Robert F. Kennedy.

The Ambassador, the Deputy Chief of Mission, and the Belgian Charge were killed in the Saudi Embassy in Khartoum by the terrorists. Among the terrorists' other demands had been the release of some particularly important terrorist leaders who had been captured and were being tried in Jordan. The terrorists in Khartoum repeatedly called for the release of these men, and, in the view of some analysts, the failure of the terrorists to obtain their release was the basic reason for the brutal assassination of these diplomats.

If a foreign government engages in acts of terrorism against the United States, the Administration has made it clear that the United States would respond effectively and vigorously using all appropriate resources at its disposal—diplomatic, political, economic, and military.

Because international terrorism affects most countries around the world, it is essential that all responsible governments adopt a common policy of not giving in to terrorist blackmail. This principle is already embodied in international conventions such as the widely accepted Hague convention on hijacking which establishes an obligation to either prosecute or extradite hijackers. Although there is a temptation to give in to the terrorists demands on humanitarian grounds to avoid the possibility of violence against the hostages, such a moral compromise is fleeting since a terrorist victory only encourages more acts which endanger additional innocent lives. No responsible government can allow itself to be dictated to by ruthless, criminal acts which endanger the lives of its citizens, citizens of other countries, and which threaten its authority. Compromise will prove transitory and over the long run will be detrimental to a country's efforts to cope effectively with the problem. ■

United Kingdom, France, and West Germany, the countries of the summit seven with bilateral air service with Afghanistan, gave notice that air links would be terminated this November. We continue to monitor the actions of countries during hijacking incidents and will urge such actions in future cases where it would be appropriate.

At the bilateral level, we have consulted many countries on sharing information on terrorists and their plans. Such exchanges occur systematically, but we need to do more to assure that

Antiterrorism Cooperation Program

In April and May of 1982, Ambassador Robert M. Sayre, the Department of State's Director for Combatting Terrorism, testified before both Houses of Congress in support of a new program intended to be a major element of the President's program to combat and deter political terrorism. The proposal asks Congress to provide authority and funding for assistance to selected friendly governments by providing them with antiterrorism training, specialized equipment where appropriate, and by generally expanding the scope and type of intergovernmental cooperation. Specifically the Department asked the Congress to amend the Foreign Assistance Act to authorize antiterrorism assistance up to a level of $5 million in FY 1983.

Both the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee responded encouragingly to this proposal and recommended to their respective bodies that the program be approved. Edward Marks, a career Foreign Service officer and formerly U.S. Ambassador to Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde and most recently of the National War College, was designated in December 1981 as the Department's Coordinator for Antiterrorism Programs.

As presently conceived, the program will begin by providing training courses in various antiterrorism skills and management techniques for the civil and police authorities of friendly developing countries subject to a terrorist threat. Training will be offered at existing U.S. Government institutions such as the FBI Academy (Quantico, Virginia), the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center (Glynco, Georgia), and the Federal Aviation Administration's Transportation Safety Institute (Oklahoma City). The training will include antiterrorist policy, government crisis management organization, incident management, hostage and barricade negotiations, airport security measures, bomb disposal, and dignitary and facility protection. The training and orientation will be designated primarily for senior officials responsible for antiterrorism policy and incident management, plus senior training personnel.

In addition, the U.S. Government will provide a limited amount of appropriate antiterrorist equipment to complement specific training programs.

The antiterrorism cooperation program has a number of objectives, all revolving around the perception that political terrorism is an international phenomenon which threatens individual countries as well as international society. Thus, it must be met by an international effort much in the way in which piracy was challenged and finally eliminated. The U.S. Government has a multifaceted antiterrorism program, important parts of which are directed toward creating the necessary international consensus. The antiterrorism assistance program shares that objective but is specifically directed toward enhancing the antiterrorist operating skills of relatively inexperienced governments and to expanding cooperation among all concerned governments.

This program will serve broader U.S. policy interests:

- Strengthen bilateral ties with friendly governments by offering this concrete assistance in an area of mutual concern;
- Assist governments, by improving their capabilities, to better protect U.S. diplomatic missions and other interests, including the American tourist; and
- Increase respect for human rights and improve the climate for them by reducing the terrorist threat to innocent third parties on the one hand, while helping governments deal with the terrorist threat by means of modern, humane, and effective antiterrorist techniques on the other.

Pending final authorization and approval by Congress for FY 1983, the Office for Combatting Terrorism is preparing implementation of the new program. By the time this article appears, selected posts will have been queried about the feasibility of their host governments participating in pilot projects. That inquiry will be followed by a circular telegram to approximately 15 other posts, initiating the participating country selection process for the antiterrorism assistance program's first full year of operation (FY 1983). ■ all members of the world community are aware of specific dangers. I wish to take this opportunity to assure you that when the United States learns that a terrorist act is being planned in any country around the world, we immediately inform the appropriate authorities of the country involved so that innocent lives may be saved. We do not and will not hold back such information. We hope that other countries will adopt a similar policy.

We have also discussed the coordination of policy responses to terrorism. We have urged other countries to adopt a policy similar to ours to deny terrorists the benefits they seek from their crimes and to bring the full force of law enforcement measures to bear on them.

Consultation and coordination of policies are only part of the solution. We have recently submitted legislation to the U.S. Congress which would authorize a program of antiterrorism assistance for foreign government law enforcement personnel. The Congress is now considering this proposal. If authorized, this program would enable us to offer training in antiterrorism security and management skills at our training facilities and to provide equipment, such as security screening devices for airports. Once legislation is passed, we will be contacting selected countries about the possibility of participation in this program. We consider this program as a way to assist countries that may want to learn our techniques of dealing with terrorists. But we also see it as an opportunity to learn by exchanging experiences with all countries that have been victims of terrorist attacks.

As I stated early in my remarks, a principal target of terrorists is the diplomat. Terrorists have recently turned their attention to foreign diplomats in the United States. We are, therefore, strengthening the protection we provide to foreign diplomats. We have introduced new legislation which will enable the Department of State to carry out its responsibilities more effectively and efficiently in cooperation with State and local authorities. We are hopeful that the Congress will act promptly on this proposal.

Although we have a strong set of policies and laws on terrorism agreed to by the international community, the international community has not been as successful in working out arrangements to give effect to these policies and laws. The countries in Europe have their own working arrangements, and there are occasional conferences such as this one. But multilateral cooperation is extremely limited. If the world community is serious about combatting terrorism, then it needs to give more attention to working arrangements that will do that. For its part, the United States stands ready to cooperate to the fullest extent.

U.S. employees in Tripoli poured motor oil on the embassy's marble staircases to delay Libyan mobs from gaining access in December 1979.

(Department of State)

State-Supported Terrorism

Unfortunately there are states which are directly involved in carrying out international terrorist acts. There are also states which find it in their interest to provide arms, training, and logistical support to terrorist organizations. Another problem, then, is that the community of nations needs to face forthrightly the fact that some of its members are promoting terrorism and others have a certain sympathy for terrorist organizations and condone what they do because they are of the same political philosophy and consider terrorism as an effective way to undermine their adversaries.

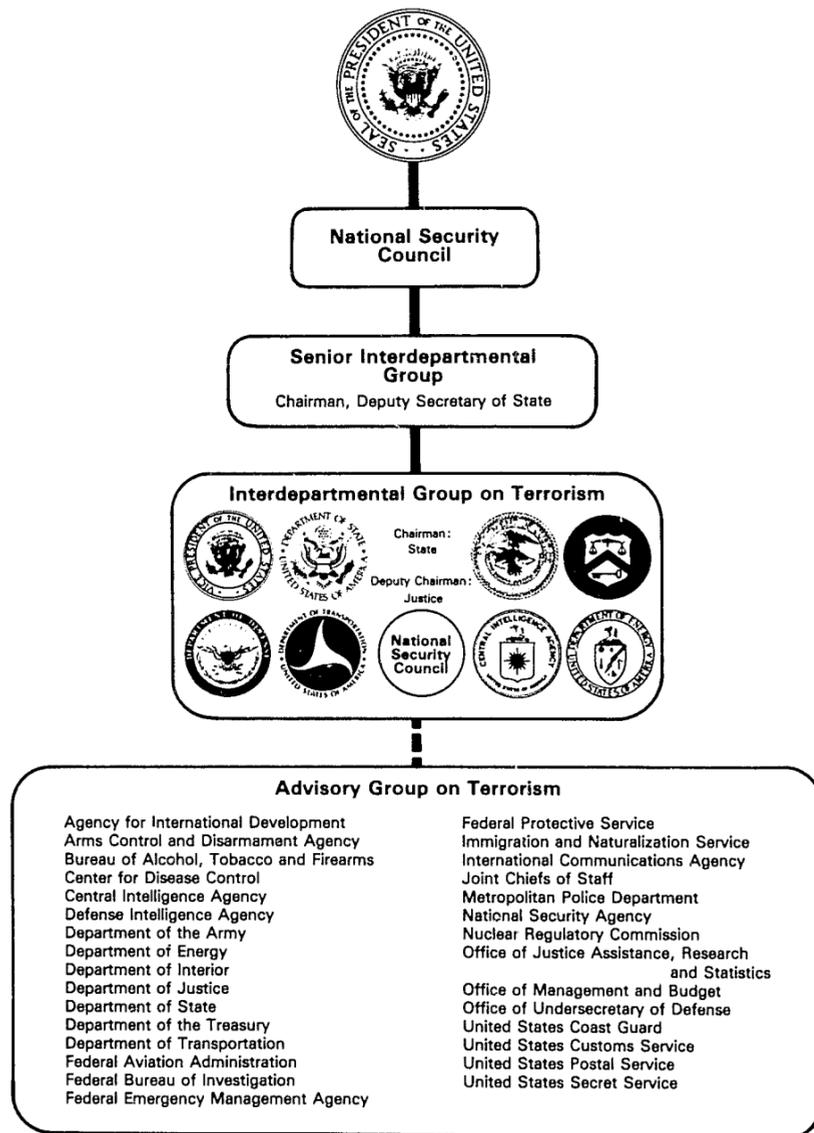

Bonn Declaration

In 1978 at the economic summit in Bonn, the heads of state and government of the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, and Japan expressed their resolve to effectively combat international hijackings when they issued the Bonn antihijacking declaration.* In essence, the declaration states that any nation which does not prosecute or extradite hijackers in its territory will face the termination of air service by the seven nations. It does not specify what sentence a hijacker must receive but does require that he be tried under the laws of the apprehending nation (or extradited).

There is good reason to believe that the declaration has had a positive effect in reducing the number of international terrorist hijackings by its reaffirmation of the need of governments to live up to their international responsibilities to either prosecute or extradite hijackers. Obviously any multinational undertaking of this type faces differences in interpretation due to the different approaches and policies regarding terrorism. However, at the 1981 Ottawa summit, the seven governments provided a clear expression of resolve by giving Afghanistan notice that it faced sanctions due to the harboring of the hijackers of a Pakistani International Airlines aircraft. This action will serve to place potential hijackers on notice that it will be difficult for them to find sanctuary.

*The Bonn declaration was published in the BULLETIN of Sept. 1978, p. 5.
The Ottawa statement was published in the BULLETIN of Aug. 1981, p. 16. ■

U.S. Government Organization for Antiterrorism, Planning, Coordination, and Policy Formulation

The U.S. Government is organized in separate but parallel ways to deal with two distinct aspects of the problem of international terrorism—policy and incident management.

The principal vehicle for coordinating policy and programs is the Interdepartmental Group on Terrorism, the senior executive branch organization devoted solely to the problem of terrorism. Chaired by the Department of State, it is made up of representatives of the Departments of Justice /FBI (deputy chairman), Defense /JCS, Energy, Treasury, and Transportation; Central Intelligence Agency; National Security Council; and the office of the Vice President. The group meets frequently, generally twice a month, to insure full coordination among the agencies of the Federal Government directly involved in antiterrorism programs. The State Department representative, and chairman, is the Director of the Office for Combatting Terrorism.

The executive branch's response to the management of terrorist incidents is based on the "lead agency" concept. State has the lead in overseas incidents, Justice/FBI the lead in incidents of domestic terrorism, and the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) plays a key role in skyjackings of U.S. flag carriers within the United States.

When a terrorist incident occurs overseas, the State Department immediately convenes a task force under the direction of the Office for Combatting Terrorism to manage the U.S. response. The task force is physically located in the Operations Center of the State Department and is in operation 24-hours a day until the incident is resolved. It is composed of representatives from the appropriate geographic and functional bureaus in the State Department and from other agencies as necessary.

When Brig. Gen. James L. Dozier was kidnapped in Verona, Italy, on December 17, 1981, for example, an interagency task force was convened by the State Department within hours after the news of the abduction. In addition to the normal members of the task force, the Department of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff were represented because of Gen. Dozier's military position. That task force remained in operation until Gen. Dozier's rescue on January 28, 1982. ■

U.S. Government Organization

What is the U.S. Government doing in both its operations and organizations to carry out the strong policy enunciated by President Reagan?

First, I am sure that you would agree that a key to dealing with the terrorist threat is good intelligence. We have recently strengthened significantly our ability to collect, analyze, and use intelligence on terrorism. We have also taken steps to improve the exchange of information with our friends and allies.

It is one thing to have intelligence; it is another to get policy officers to act on it. We have made organizational changes that improve our alert system and response capability. Certainly, on the intelligence side, we are in much better shape today than we were a year or two ago.

Second, soon after the Reagan Administration assumed office, it created an Interdepartmental Group on Terrorism—most of you would say interministerial—to serve as the policy formulation and coordination body for the government. It is composed of representatives of Federal agencies with direct responsibilities for combatting international terrorism. I am the chairman of that group. Since its inception it conducted a complete review of U.S. policy and proposed several initiatives. One of the gaps that needed to be filled was a clear operational arrangement to provide support to the President and other key decisionmakers during a major terrorist incident. This has been remedied, and we believe that we are now better organized to get prompt policy guidance so that we can respond swiftly and effectively to a terrorist incident.

The possible use of force to resolve an incident is another important aspect of our response capability. In the United States, most major cities have SWAT [special weapons and tactics] teams. Each district of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) has its own SWAT team. The rescue missions which were conducted at Entebbe, Mogadishu, and the Iranian Embassy in London last year, as well as a number of aircraft incidents, emphasize the need for an effective assault capability. The United States has dedicated military forces for such a purpose. Although we consider the use of force in resolving a terrorist incident a measure of last resort, it is important to have these capabilities should they be needed.

Role of the Department of State

To many of you, terrorism is a domestic problem and you may wonder why the foreign office would head the Federal Government group on terrorism. The answer is quite simple: For the United States, most of the terrorist incidents have been directed against our diplomats or American interests overseas. The Department of State is the "ministry" in the United States most directly affected and best able to respond. We do have terrorist incidents in the United States and when they occur, it is the responsibility of the Department of Justice to take the lead and respond. As all of you attending this conference know, when it is the unique case of an aircraft, it is the responsibility of our Federal Aviation Administration (FAA).

As you might expect, the Department of State has taken many steps over the years to improve our security, especially overseas. We are now engaged in major improvements to many of our embassies which will provide better protection to both personnel and physical facilities. Some 15¢ out of every $1.00 the Department spends on operations is for security. So it is no small matter to us. And other governments which have the responsibility for protecting American Embassies are spending again collectively as much as we do. It is my responsibility to assure that we recommend security policies and programs that provide a prudent level of protection. We are doing that.

Conclusion

We believe we have in place the policies, programs, and organization to deal with terrorism, but we are fully aware that there is much more to be done.

The international community must continue and strengthen its efforts to cooperate more fully on terrorism. The international organizations in particular—the United Nations and the regional organizations—might consider additional conventions to outlaw terrorist tactics, such as assassinations and bombings, and bring these additional tactics under the "prosecute or extradite" obligation. The international community must give special emphasis to working arrangements that will give full effect to these policies and conventions. We are hopeful that we can implement our proposed antiterrorism training program beginning in 1983 and that it will make a significant contribution to more effective working relationships among civil authorities responsible for dealing with terrorism.

Individual countries should redouble their efforts to make clear that terrorism is an unacceptable method for achieving change. No matter what one's ideological preferences, a bomb in a train station or a threat of death against a plane load of civil air passengers is not an acceptable way to bring one's causes to public attention or to overthrow a government. An adequate response requires not only a better intelligence capability so that we are warned of possible terrorist acts, but that the machinery of government is organized from top to bottom so that we act promptly when a terrorist incident occurs. I believe that we in the U.S. Government are now prepared, but it will require constant vigilance, planning, and the exercise of our organizational system to have confidence that we can deal effectively with terrorist incidents.

We must work to establish a world in which peaceful change can occur without violence and terror. We must also be vigilant in our mutual efforts to prevent terrorist attacks. You have a particularly important part to play in prevention. I know that we will continue to work together toward this goal. In that effort, you can be certain that the United States is prepared to be a full and reliable partner. ■

Patterns of International Terrorism: 1981

A Jewish synagogue in Antwerp was bombed by the PFLP/SC on October 20, 1981, causing 2 deaths and 95 injuries.

Overview

Both the number of international terrorist incidents and the number of casualties resulting from incidents fell in 1981 (figure 1). Deaths caused by terrorist attacks dropped dramatically from 642 in 1980 to 173 in 1981. Despite this decline in the number of casualties, the long-term trend is toward more serious threats to human life. In 1970 about half the international terrorist incidents were directed against people and half were directed against property. In 1981, 80% of such incidents were directed against people.

Attacks against U.S. citizens also declined in number with fewer casualties, but all the U.S. fatalities in 1981 (as in 1980) were killed because of their nationality. In earlier years, most were victims of indiscriminate terrorist attacks that had little or nothing to do with their citizenship.

The trend toward a broader geographic spread of international terrorism continued in 1981; incidents occurred in 91 countries, more than in any previous year. Government-sponsored international terrorist attacks were mainly directed against Middle Easterners in the Middle East.

Key Patterns in 1981

Types of Attacks. In 1981 international terrorists used a variety of methods to achieve their goals—including kidnapping, hostage taking, assassination, bombing, threats, and hoaxes (table 1). The number of serious incidents—kidnappings, major bombings, assassinations, and skyjackings—dropped. Although assassinations and assassination attempts dropped from 111 in 1980 to 70 last year, 1981 still had the second-highest total since 1968, when the United States began to record such incidents.

In the first part of 1981, the number of skyjackings was high, but after a few well-publicized failures, their incidence declined. In March a Pakistani commercial airliner was hijacked first to Afghanistan and then to Syria by the Pakistan Liberation Army (PLA). The resulting release of prisoners in Pakistan, combined with publicity and eventual freedom for the terrorists, probably encouraged other, less-successful attempts. An Indonesian plane was also seized in March and taken to Thailand where all the terrorists were killed by Indonesian forces, and the hijacking of a Turkish plane to Bulgaria was foiled by the pilot and passengers. Fewer incidents occurred during the rest of the year, apart from several attempts by East Europeans to hijack planes to the West. One dramatic exception was the simultaneous hijack-

International Terrorist Incidents

ing of three planes from Venezuela via Central America to Cuba, where the hostages were released. The total number of skyjackings reported in 1981 was 32, four less than the previous year. Caution is indicated in using these figures, however, as the United States suspects far more incidents may have occurred in Eastern Europe than the United States has recorded.

Location of Attacks. Figures for 1981 confirm a clear trend toward a greater geographic spread of international terrorism.

1970	48 countries
1975	57 countries
1980	76 countries
1981	91 countries

The great majority of incidents, however, continued to occur in a few areas where conditions facilitate publicity and in some cases provide greater safety for the perpetrators—Western Europe, Latin America, the Middle East, and North America. More incidents occurred in the United States than in any other country, but Argentina, Lebanon, West Germany, France, and Italy were also sites of frequent terrorism.

Victims. In 1981 citizens of 77 countries were the victims of international terrorist incidents, more than in any previous year since January 1968. As in past years, U.S. citizens were the primary target, followed by those of the United Kingdom, U.S.S.R., France, Israel, Turkey, and Iraq. Attacks or threats against citizens of these seven countries accounted for more than 60% of the 709 incidents (including threats and hoaxes) recorded in 1981. Incidents directed against U.S. citizens or facilities totaled 258 last year.

In terms of who or what is attacked, there are several clear and ominous trends. In 1970 about half of the incidents were against people, the rest against property. Now, 80% are directed against people. Diplomats are the foremost category; the number of attacks against them rose from an average 165 per year during 1975-79 to 409 in 1980 and then dropped to 368 in 1981, when they constituted more than half of all victims. This is due in part to the rising number of attacks sponsored by

were the victims in 12% of the incidents, and military personnel were involved in about 9%. Attacks against military personnel constitute one of the fastest growing categories.

Terrorist Groups. A total of 113 groups claimed credit for international terrorist incidents in 1981, down slightly from the high of 128 in 1980. These numbers are undoubtedly inflated: some groups create cover names to avoid responsibility for a particular action, others use them to commemorate an anniversary, and common criminals create still others to mislead investigators. The terrorists represented 86 nationalities, but, as in the past, Palestinians, Armenians, West Germans, and Central Americans were responsible for the majority of incidents.

Terrorist Events Causing Death or Injury. Only about one-fourth as many people were killed in terrorist attacks in 1981 as in the previous year—173 compared with 642. The number injured also dropped, but not as dramatically (figure 2). The patterns were, however, similar to previous years. Assassination attempts and bombings accounted for the majority of attacks that involved casualties, and most of these incidents occurred in Western Europe and the Middle East. Terrorists appear to have been more careful in selecting their targets, and more than half of such attacks resulted in harm only to the intended victim, whereas in the past innocent bystanders were much more often the victims.

Attacks that produced casualties occurred in 56 countries. The greatest number took place in Lebanon, where many of the Middle Eastern terrorist groups are headquartered and where

Categories of Terrorist Incidents

Kidnapping

Seizure of one or more victims, who are then moved to a hideout.

Barricade-Hostage

Seizure of a facility with whatever hostages are available; their release is made contingent on meeting terrorists' demands.

Bombing

Major bombing—use of any type of explosive or incendiary device for terrorist purposes, including those delivered through the mail, when significant damage or casualties occur or a terrorist group claims responsibility. Minor bombing—same as above except that there are no casualties and little or no damage, and no group claims responsibility.

Armed Attack

An attempt to seize or damage a facility, with no intent to hold it for negotiating purposes.

Hijacking

An attempt to seize an airplane, ship, or other vehicle, with whatever hostages may be in it, to force some action—movement to another country and/or agreement by the authorities involved to some terrorist demand.

Assassination

An attempt, whether or not successful, to kill a preselected victim, usually with small arms or bombs. Letter bombs are excluded from this category, although, in at least some cases, there probably is a specific intended victim.

Sabotage

Intentional destruction of property by means other than bombing.

Exotic Pollution

Use of exotic substances—atomic, chemical, or biological—to contaminate material; for example, the introduction of mercury into oranges shipped from Israel.

Threat Hoax

The stated intent by a terrorist group to carry out an attack, or a false alert to authorities about a coming terrorist attack by a named group.

These incidents serve terrorists' purposes in that they tend to alarm and intimidate potential victims, their parent states and organizations, and often the local populace. They usually cause facilities to be evacuated, absorb the time of investigative authorities, and generally disrupt the work of the threatened group.

Well over half the recorded threats and hoaxes are directed against U.S. citizens—673 out of a total of 1,081 threats and 78 out of 143 hoaxes. This is at least partially attributable to the fact that the United States has much more information about such incidents than it does about threats or hoaxes directed against other nations' citizens. Moreover, much of the information on such incidents directed against foreigners is derived from their reports to U.S. authorities about such attacks in the United States—frequently at the United Nations.

Theft, Break-In

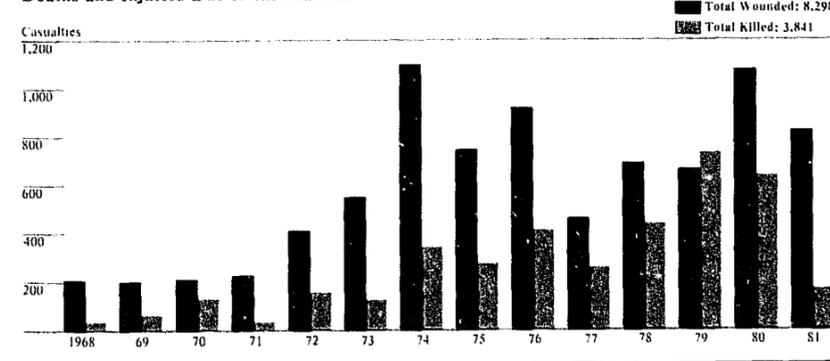

Illegal entry into a facility to intimidate or harass its owners.

Other

Includes sniping, shootouts with police, arms smuggling, and credible reports of plotting a terrorist attack that is subsequently foiled or aborted. In all cases a terrorist group is named. ■ responsibility for security is fragmented. Included in the Lebanese total are a number of Iraqi and Iranian attacks on each other's diplomats.

Fifty-eight terrorist groups claimed responsibility for attacks that produced casualties in 1981, compared with 49 in 1980. The Armenian and Palestinian groups were responsible for most of these attacks. Nationalities most victimized changed little from 1980: Americans were most numerous among casualties, followed by Israelis, Britons, Iraqis, and Iranians.

Attacks Against U.S. Citizens. A total of 258 international terrorist incidents were directed against U.S. citizens or property during 1981—slightly more than in most previous years but not as many as in 1978 and 1980. There were nine kidnappings, 14 assassination attacks, and 91 bombings of U.S. property—about the same as in 1980. Threats dropped significantly from 50 to 29, but hoaxes rose from 25 to 51 (tables 2 and 3 and figure 3).

A new and ominous development is that all the Americans killed by international terrorist attacks in 1980 and 1981 were assassinated because of their nationality. In earlier years, most Americans killed in such incidents were victims of indiscriminate attacks that had little or nothing to do with their nationality. Moreover, at least one terrorist group, the Red Brigades, is known to have shifted to less well-protected U.S. officials after initially planning to attack a closely guarded target.

Seventy-two international terrorist groups took credit for attacks against Americans in 1981. The Colombian leftist group—April 19 Movement (M-19)—claimed the largest number. The Red Army Faction (RAF) and its sympathizers in West Germany and terrorist groups in El Salvador, Guatemala, and Peru also carried out a significant number of attacks against Americans.

In addition to nongovernment-sponsored terrorist attacks in 1981, the United States was confronted by Libyan leader Qadhafi's threat to assassinate President Reagan and other senior U.S. government officials and to attack U.S. facilities abroad.

In 1981, 17% of incidents directed against Americans resulted in at least one casualty. Six Americans were killed and 31 wounded in international terrorist attacks in 1981. These numbers are slightly lower than in the last few years. This is partially due to good fortune; the number of attempted violent attacks has not decreased.

All six U.S. citizens killed in 1981 were assassinated in Latin America, where more than one-third of the incidents directed against Americans occurred. While the attacks were no more frequent than in 1980, the number in each year was higher than in any previous year. Five assassination attacks, eight kidnappings, 37 bombings, and four skyjackings that involved U.S. citizens were recorded in Latin America during the year.

- In El Salvador 15 incidents took place, including a series of armed attacks against the U.S. Embassy in March and April and the murder of two Americans in January.

- In Guatemala there were 14 attacks, including five kidnappings and the murder of three U.S. citizens.

- In Costa Rica a bomb destroyed a van carrying Marine guards to the U.S. Embassy, injuring three guards and their driver.

- In Colombia the M-19 carried out eight attacks on Americans during the year, including the murder of a kidnapped missionary.

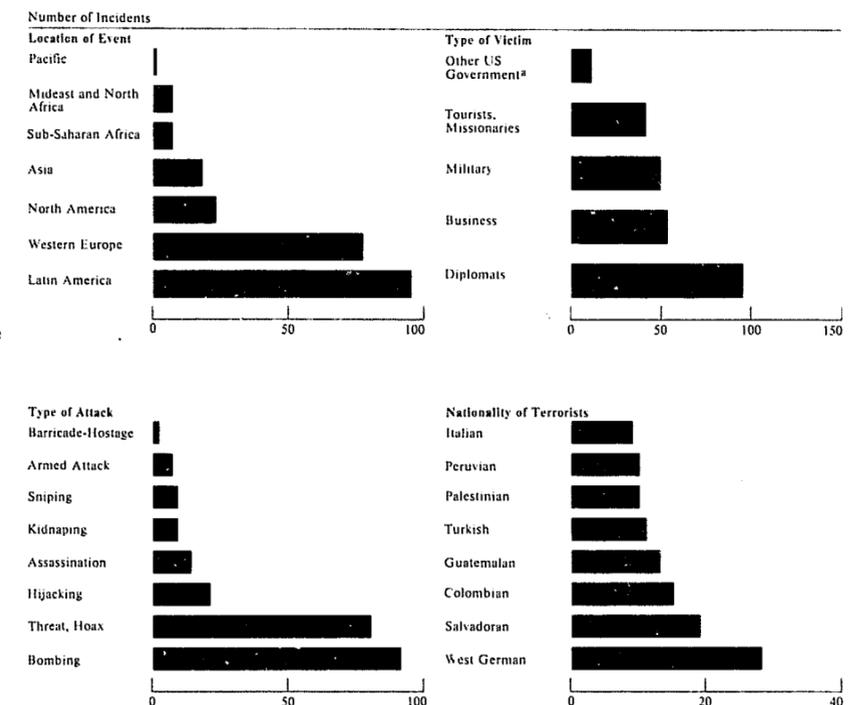

- In Peru the U.S. chancery and the ambassador's residence were bombed on August 31.

A total of 30 attacks were directed against U.S. personnel and property in West Germany during 1981—more than in any other year. They were carried out by RAF members or sympathizers and included an attempt to assassinate Gen. Frederick Kroesen (commander, U.S. forces in Europe) as well as numerous bombings of U.S. facilities. The last bombing of the year, on August 31 at Ramstein AFB, damaged the headquarters building and injured 18 people, including a U.S. brigadier general.

The Broader Picture

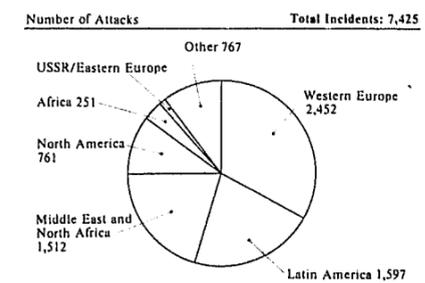

Since the United States began recording international terrorist incidents in 1968, a number of broad patterns have emerged. Some are relatively unchanging, such as the distribution of terrorist incidents—where Western Europe, Latin America, and the Middle East continue to account for about three-fourths of all incidents (figure 4). Almost half of the incidents recorded since 1968 have occurred in only nine countries. The greatest number were recorded in the United States (partly because information is better); other nations with a large number of incidents include Argentina, Italy, France, West Germany, Iran, Turkey, Greece, and Israel. These are convenient locations for terrorist operations, and in many cases the incident did not even involve citizens of the country in which the event occurred. Fewer than 20% of the events in France involved French terrorists, for example, and an even smaller portion of the victims were French nationals.

Over the past 14 years, more than 20% of all international terrorist incidents occurred in Latin America, and the number in that region has been increasing faster than in other parts of the world. More attacks were recorded in 1980-81 than in any other 2-year period since 1968, primarily reflecting the spillover of increased domestic violence into the international arena. In most cases, the attacks were carried out by indigenous groups against foreigners in an attempt to discredit or undermine the local regime. In some cases the attacks were by rightwing groups against foreigners who were thought to sympathize with antigovernment forces.

From 1968 through 1981, the United States recorded 1,512 international terrorist incidents in the Middle East and North Africa. The number of attacks in the region was highest in 1978 (reflecting increased anti-American activity in Iran), remained high in 1979 and 1980, and declined somewhat in 1981. As in Latin America, much of the international terrorism is a spillover from domestic violence; Iran in 1978 is a good example. Most of the attacks in that region were carried out by Middle Eastern terrorists, and about half were directly at other Middle Eastern citizens. Responsibility was claimed by 151 different terrorist groups—mostly Palestinian.¹

While citizens of almost every country have been victimized by international terrorism, most incidents have been directed against those of only a few countries (figure 5). U.S. records show that between 1968 and 1981, citizens of 131 different countries were victimized by international terrorism; attacks against U.S., Israeli, U.K., West German, French, and U.S.S.R. nationals account for more than 60% of all the incidents. Americans were by far the most often targeted.² Of the 7,425 attacks recorded, 38% were directed against U.S. citizens. This reflects the wide geographic spread of American interests and the fact that U.S. citizens are regarded as symbols of Western wealth and power.

Each year, between 35% and 45% of all the international terrorist incidents are directed against U.S. personnel or property. The second-highest number of incidents against any single country has consistently been far less—about 10% of the total. Usually either Israel or the United Kingdom has been the second most victimized country. In 1979, however, it was France and in 1980, the Soviet Union.

Diplomats have been the foremost target of terrorist incidents, accounting for nearly 40% of the total (figure 6). Businesses and businessmen are the second most frequent victims. Since 1968 almost one-fourth of the incidents were directed against business, especially U.S. business in Latin America. The number reached a high in 1978 and declined thereafter—in part because of increased security, improved operating procedures in high-risk areas, and, most importantly, a shift in focus by many terrorist groups.

Although military personnel are not as large a segment of the victim population as diplomats or businessmen, the United States has recorded 600 terrorist attacks (fewer than 10% of the total) against them. The number of attacks against the military is increasing at the greatest rate.

The pattern of terrorist events that produce casualties appears to be changing. In 1,614 such incidents (figure 7), 3,841 people were killed and 8,298 wounded. Bombings and assassinations account for more than 70% of the attacks that produced casualties. Bombings have always been the most prevalent, perhaps the most serious being the December 15, 1981, bombing of the Iraqi Embassy in Beirut, which killed at least 55 and injured another 100.

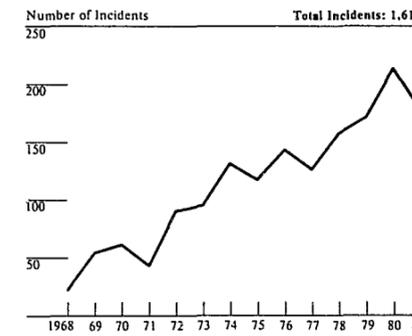

In recent years, however, assassination attempts have increased dramatically, especially from 1977 to 1980.

1968-76	20 (annual average)
1977	34
1978	54
1979	65
1980	111
1981	70

This increase is attributable to the fact that several countries—Libya, Syria, and Iran among them—have increasingly used their military and intelligence services to carry out terrorist attacks against foreign diplomats or their own exiles.

U.S. citizens have been the victims of only 20% of all attacks that produced casualties, while suffering more than 40% of all international terrorist incidents. U.S. businessmen have been the primary target of casualty-producing attacks, but attacks on U.S. diplomats and military personnel have increased at a faster rate in recent years.

Figure 7
International Terrorist Incidents That Caused Casualties

Over the period 1968-81, attacks on Americans that produced casualties occurred in 69 countries, most frequently in Argentina, Iran, and the Philippines. More than 155 terrorist groups claimed responsibility for one or more attacks. The Argentine Montoneros and Iranian and Palestinian groups have been the most prominent perpetrators.

In 1981, for the first time, the United States has grouped terrorist incidents into more serious and less serious categories. As shown in figure 8, the number of serious incidents—such as kidnappings, the taking of hostages, assassination attacks, and major bombings—rose rapidly in the early 1970s, remained fairly steady between 1974 and 1979, then jumped to new highs in 1980-81. Less serious incidents have fluctuated more widely. The peak year for relatively minor incidents, 1978, saw a drop in serious incidents. Minor bombings and threats account for more than 80% of the less serious incidents.

The trend of serious international terrorist incidents involving U.S. citizens or property has shown little variation (figure 9). It peaked in 1975, declined thereafter, only to rise somewhat in the past 2 years. Less serious incidents account for most of the year-to-year variation in total incidents involving the United States.

Terrorist Groups

More than 670 groups have claimed credit for at least one international attack since the United States began keeping statistics in 1968. This number is undoubtedly inflated: some of these are cover names for organizations wishing to deny responsibility for a particular action, and some have probably been used by common criminals to throw off investigators or by psychotics seeking public recognition. The list includes the names of nations that conduct international terrorism such as Libya and Syria, insurgency groups that use terrorist tactics, separatist groups such as the ETA (a Basque group), and nihilist groups such as the RAF and the Japanese Red Army. It includes leftwing groups, rightwing groups, anti-American groups, anti-Soviet groups, environmentalist groups, and even religious groups. They represent the spectrum of ideologies, classes, cultures, and races.

The annual number of groups that claim credit for attacks has increased markedly since the United States began keeping statistics. For example, 49 groups claimed credit for attacks in 1970, rising to 111 groups by 1975, and 128 groups by 1980. It dropped slightly to 113 in 1981.

While some terrorist groups have dropped out of sight during the 14-year period, a large number have persisted. They are well organized, with a dedicated core of well-trained and highly motivated terrorists. Moreover, they usually have at least some popular support. Although the Provisional Irish Republican Army (PIRA) is primarily a domestic terrorist group that conducts operations in Northern Ireland, U.S. records show that the PIRA and its sympathizers have conducted more international terrorism than any other group. The PIRA has launched attacks from several countries, and the attacks have involved citizens from at least 15 countries, although the majority were against British nationals.

The Black September Organization has carried out the second-largest number of attacks, most of them in Europe and the Middle East, targeted against Israelis and moderate Palestinians. Other Palestinian groups—particularly the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), the PFLP-General Command, and the Black June Organization (BJO)—have conducted terrorist incidents during the past 14 years. Together, the Palestinian groups perpetrated more international attacks than any other movement. U.S. records show 9% of all terrorist attacks (almost 700) have been carried out by Palestinians.

Other significant groups that have been active in international terrorism are the Montoneros, the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia (ASALA), the Basque Fatherland and Liberty, the M-19, and the RAF. Among the states most active in carrying out international terrorist attacks are Libya, Iran, Syria, and Iraq.

Figure 5

Nationality of Victims of International Terrorist Attacks, 1968-81

Activities of Significant Groups in 1981

The United States recorded 113 terrorist groups that claimed credit for international attacks during 1981. The terrorists represented 86 nationalities, and, as in the past, Palestinians, Armenians, Germans, Salvadorans, and Guatemalans carried out the most attacks.

Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia. ASALA carried out more international attacks during 1981 than any other terrorist organization. Its primary targets in the past have been Turkish diplomats and diplomatic facilities, but, under cover names, ASALA has attacked Swiss interests in retaliation for the arrest of ASALA members, and, using the name Orly Organization, it has attacked French interests in retaliation for the November arrest of an Armenian carrying a false passport at Orly Airport. ASALA carried out 40 attacks in 11 countries during the year. Although most of the attacks were bombings against French and Swiss property, the most serious were attacks against Turkish diplomats. These included the September 24 seizure of the Turkish Consulate in Paris and the assassination of Turkish diplomats in Switzerland, Denmark, and France.

Palestinian Terrorists. Palestinian terrorists have not been as active in international terrorism in recent years as during the mid-1970s. In 1981 some radical Palestinian groups resumed international terrorist attacks. Palestinian terrorists carried out a total of 49 attacks during 1981; groups such as the May 15 Organization, Black June Organization, and the PFLP-SC (Special Command) were the most active. This is far more than recorded in 1979 or 1980 but about the same as during the mid-1970s. The attacks were committed in 14 countries. Most of the incidents were bombings, six were assassination attempts, five were armed attacks, and one was a rocket attack.

The May 15 Organization and the PFLP-SC were active in 1981. The former carried out attacks against Israeli targets in Europe, including bomb attacks on the embassies in Vienna and Athens and on El Al offices in Italy and Turkey. It also claimed credit for the bombing of a Cypriot cruise ship in Haifa, Israel. The PFLP-SC carried out a series of bombings in the Middle East and is believed responsible for the October 20 bombing of a synagogue in Belgium.

The Black June Organization (BJO), a radical Palestinian group which opposes political settlement with Israel and Palestine Liberation Organization leader Arafat's moderate policies, was also very active during 1981. It targeted moderate Palestinians, Israelis, and non-Israeli Jews. On September 23, BJO launched a hand grenade attack on the offices of an Israeli shipping line in Cyprus. BJO killed moderate Palestinian leaders on June 1 in Brussels and on October 9 in Rome. (This is the group that attempted to assassinate the Israeli Ambassador in London on June 3, 1982, an incident that preceded the Israeli invasion of Lebanon.)

Provisional Irish Republican Army. The PIRA was more active in 1981 than in most previous years. It retaliated for the attempted assassination of Bernadette Devlin McAliskey with the murder of Sir Norman Stronge and his son.

PIRA expanded the tactic of prisoner hunger strikes. After a 66-day fast, Bobby Sands died on May 5. He was the first and most widely publicized PIRA militant to die in 1981. Nine other PIRA and Irish National Liberation Army (INLA) members died after unsuccessful attempts to gain prisoner-of-war status for the terrorist inmates. After the failure of the hunger strikes, the PIRA intensified its campaign of violence in England. In October and November it claimed credit for bombing facilities in London, mailed several bombs to British facilities, kidnapped the son of a wealthy Irish businessman, and attempted to assassinate the Commanding General of the British Royal Marines. PIRA sympathizers destroyed British cars in West Germany, bombed a British cultural center in Greece, attacked British targets in Portugal, and threatened British facilities in Switzerland.

Red Army Faction. The RAF in 1981 launched a series of attacks against the U.S. presence in West Germany despite a series of setbacks in 1980. The RAF had been rebuilding its operational structure for some time, and in an attempt to capitalize on the controversy over NATO nuclear weapons modernization plans and "squatters' rights" in West Berlin, the RAF and its sympathizer groups carried out numerous attacks.

The RAF or its supporters claimed credit for numerous attacks during the year. It firebombed U.S. military facilities in Frankfurt and Wiesbaden. It attempted to bomb the U.S. library in West Berlin and the Dow chemical plant in Dusseldorf. On August 31, the RAF exploded a car bomb at the U.S. Air Force Headquarters at Ramstein. It attempted to assassinate U.S. Gen. Frederick Kroesen on September 15, firing two rocket-propelled antitank weapons at Kroesen's car; one missed, and the other hit the trunk. The car was severely damaged, but no one was seriously injured. Sympathizer groups

During 1981 Irish terrorists imprisoned in Northern Ireland carried out hunger strikes "to the death." Ten prisoners died.

Skyjacking

Since January 1968, there have been 684 attempted skyjackings, representing about 9% of all terrorist attacks since that date. According to U.S. records, those attempts have resulted in at least 50 fatalities and 400 injuries. More than one-third of the hijackers demanded passage to Cuba. Nearly 40% of the planes hijacked belonged to U.S. carriers (such as Eastern, National, and TWA).

The number of attempted skyjackings reached a high in 1969-70, declined slightly in 1971-72, then decreased by half in 1973, and has remained fairly constant since then. These decreases are easily traced to increased public awareness of and concern for this threat. The 1970 multiple skyjacking by Palestinian terrorists was the catalyst for international concern which resulted in The Hague and Montreal conventions on aerial hijacking. In January 1973, the full screening of boarding passengers and luggage inspection was instituted in the United States and, to a lesser extent, at international airports in other countries; that year the number of skyjacking attempts was half that of the previous year. The U.S. Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) reports that more than 20,000 firearms have been confiscated since the institution of these security measures.

Of the 684 skyjacking attempts since 1968, 108 have been designated terrorist skyjackings, meaning they were politically motivated. More than one-third of these resulted in casualties (212 dead and 186 wounded). Terrorist skyjackings originated in 43 countries and terminated in 47 countries, most of them in Latin America, Western Europe, and the Middle East. Forty-eight terrorist groups claimed the credit, almost half of them Palestinians and Latin Americans.

Between 1973 and 1980, terrorists averaged five skyjacking attempts a year. There was a significant increase in 1981, partly attributable to the Pakistan Liberation Army's (PLA) successful skyjack in March, which probably encouraged other attempts. As of May 31, 1982, there have been four terrorist skyjackings, suggesting a decrease from the 1981 total.

Terrorists achieved logistic success in 70% of their attempts between January 1968 and June 1982. (Logistic success does not mean that ancillary demands were met; it simply notes whether the skyjacker was able to divert the plane to a destination selected by the terrorist.) ■ also attacked West German and U.S. targets in Germany and other European countries. The Black Block bombed two U.S. military facilities near Frankfurt and attempted to bomb the railroad line to the Rhein/Main airbase. Others bombed the U.S. Consul General's office and a military base near Frankfurt and U.S. military facilities in Kassal, Wiesbaden, and West Berlin. They also attacked a West German Consulate in Switzerland and the U.S. Embassy in Sofia.

Red Brigades. Despite some setbacks early in the year, the Red Brigades broadened their targets to include foreign nationals in 1981. The confessions of Patrizio Peci, the arrest of RB planner Mario Moretti, and increased government antiterrorist activity contributed to pressure on the RB.

The RB claimed credit for numerous attacks during the past year—the assassination of a hospital director in Milan, a prison warden in Rome, and four police officials. The RB kidnapped three individuals, murdering one and releasing the other two after holding them for lengthy periods. In retaliation for Peci's testimony, the RB kidnapped and killed his brother and shot one of his defense attorneys. During the year, the RB also wounded 12 victims, bombed four facilities, and robbed a bank in Rome.

On December 17, RB kidnapped U.S. Army Brig. Gen. James Dozier from his home in Verona, Italy. Italian authorities subsequently arrested more than 300 suspects and uncovered large amounts of weapons and supplies in the search for Dozier and subsequent counterterrorist operations. On January 28, 1982, Italian officers rescued Dozier from a safehouse in Padua.

Basque Fatherland and Liberty. In Spain, the ETA-PM (Political-Military) and the ETA-M (Military), both Marxist-Leninist-oriented Basque separatist organizations, continued their campaign of violence against the Spanish Government. They also targeted citizens from six other countries in Spain, including threats to bomb the U.S. airbase near Torrejon.

Early in January the government granted greater autonomy for the Basque region in an attempt to decrease tension, but this did not stop the terrorists; they claimed credit for many attacks during the next few months. Near the end of January, the terrorists fired antitank weapons at government buildings in two Basque cities, kidnapped a prominent citizen in Bilbao, and kidnapped and murdered the chief nuclear engineer at the Lemoniz power plant in northern Spain. During the same month, the Spanish police rescued unharmed a prominent doctor who had been kidnapped in Madrid and was being held in northeast Spain by ETA-PM for a U.S. $2 million ransom.

On February 20, in a coordinated operation, the ETA kidnapped the honorary consuls to Spain from Austria, El Salvador, and Uruguay. The consuls were held for a week, and the attack received widespread publicity.

On February 23, the ETA-PM announced its intention to abandon terrorism. Shortly thereafter the ETA-M increased its terrorist campaign. In February and March, it bombed facilities, attacked police patrols, and assassinated prominent members of the Spanish Government. A few months later the ETA-M carried out another series of attacks, which included assaults on police and Civil Guard facilities and bombings of the Spanish electric company.

April 19 Movement. The Colombian April 19 Movement (M-19) carried out 11 international terrorist operations in 1981, including bombings, hijackings, and one kidnapping. All of the incidents occurred in Colombia and almost all were targeted against the United States. A faction of the group kidnapped a U.S. citizen, and after weeks of negotiations and threats his body was found in an abandoned bus in Bogota.

The M-19 attempted large-scale military operations on March 8 and 11, launching amphibious attacks on three remote villages in southern Colombia. Government forces killed or captured most of the terrorists. M-19 suffered another major setback when a truckload of sophisticated weapons, including rocket grenades and machineguns, was captured by the Colombian border guard.

Marxist-Leninist Armed Propaganda Unit. In Turkey the MLAPU, a faction of the Turkish People's Liberation Party/Front, the most anti-U.S. of all the leftist groups in Turkey, was responsible for the deaths of seven Americans in 1979 and one in 1980. MLAPU killed no Americans in 1981 and had very little success in other terrorist attacks during the year.

Since imposition of martial law in September 1980, the Turkish military government has killed or arrested a number of MLAPU members, raided safehouses, and executed convicted MLAPU members. Although the group suffered setbacks during the year, it was able to conduct some terrorist operations, both against the U.S. presence in Turkey and against the Turkish Government. On January 22, the MLAPU attempted to assassinate two U.S. soldiers as they walked to a bus stop. On April 6, the MLAPU claimed credit for an attack on a U.S. military vehicle. Although the vehicle was hit by machinegun fire a number of times, no one was seriously injured. The terrorists who carried out this attack were arrested in a raid on a safehouse the following day.

Special Cases—Guatemala and El Salvador. In Guatemala and El Salvador, prolonged domestic strife has created fertile soil for terrorism, both domestic and international. Terrorism is a major tactic of both leftwing and rightwing groups in El Salvador. Of the Five leftwing groups forming the Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN), the Popular Liberation Forces (FPL), is the strongest and largest. Groups operating under the rubric FMLN or FPL, claimed responsibility for most of the attacks in 1981, including 18 attacks on U.S. personnel or facilities and 10 attacks on the embassies or private facilities of other Central American countries. Among the incidents involving U.S. citizens was a series of attacks on the U.S. Embassy during March and April. Other attacks on Americans in El Salvador included the bombing of the Exxon compound, a Hardee's restaurant, and the Citibank facilities.

Rightwing terrorists were also active in El Salvador, with most attacks against other Salvadoran citizens. On January 3, the head of the agrarian reform program and two U.S. advisers were assassinated by three terrorists while at a dinner meeting at the Sheraton Hotel in San Salvador. Two men arrested in connection with this case have ties with extreme rightwing groups opposed to Salvadoran land reform.

In Guatemala terrorism figured as a major tactic of the right, the left, and the Guatemalan Government. U.S. files contain records of 27 international terrorist attacks in 1981. These include bombings, kidnappings, and four assassination attempts. While most of the international attacks were carried out by leftwing groups such as the Guerrilla Army of the Poor, two U.S. citizens were assassinated by rightwing groups. Thirteen of the attacks were directed at American personnel and property. Other victims of international terrorism in Guatemala included citizens of Japan, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom, Spain, and Honduras.

Among the most publicized assassinations were two U.S. missionaries working in Guatemala and a U.S. businessman, who had been kidnapped in December 1980 by leftwing guerrillas during an attempted rescue by the Guatemalan police. Numerous bombings of foreign facilities were recorded, including the Pan American headquarters, the Honduran airline office, the American Chamber of Commerce office, an Eastern Airlines plane on the ground, the Chevron oil depot in Guatemala City, the British Consul's office, and a U.S. owned hotel. Other incidents included the murders of an Italian and a Spanish priest working in the area and the kidnapping of an Australian and a U.S. citizen for ransom.

State-Sponsored International Terrorism

Nations support international terrorist groups or engage in terrorist attacks to influence policies of other countries, to establish or strengthen regional or global influence, and, in some cases, to eliminate or terrorize dissident exiles and nationals from adversary countries.

Many countries are reluctant to condemn states that support or engage in international terrorist activities when those activities are cloaked in the mantle of anti-imperialism. Other countries tolerate state-sponsored terrorist activities because they fear economic or other forms of retaliation by the sponsoring states.

U.S. records list 129 terrorist attacks conducted directly by national governments, but this figure almost certainly understates the incidence of state-sponsored terrorism. More than 80% of the 129 attacks took place in 1980 and 1981, and almost 40% were assassinations or attempted assassinations. This is roughly six times the percentage of assassinations recorded in non-state-sponsored terrorist attacks. State-sponsored attacks were more lethal than other terrorist incidents, 44% resulting in casualties—a total of 60 persons injured and 61 killed. A majority of these attacks occurred in the Middle East, were carried out by Middle East nations, and were directed against expatriates and diplomats from Middle Eastern countries.

The pattern of state-sponsored international terrorist incidents in 1981 was similar to that of 1980. The 44 attacks occurred in 20 different countries, but almost half were in Lebanon. The attacks were directed against citizens from 17 countries, half of them from the Middle East. Incidents included kidnappings, bombings, assassinations, and armed attacks against embassies or other facilities. During 1981, 21 victims were killed and 28 wounded in state-sponsored international terrorist attacks.

Soviet Union. The Soviets provide training, arms, and other direct and indirect support to a variety of national insurgent and separatist groups. Many of these groups commit international terrorist attacks as part of their program of revolutionary violence. Moreover, some of the individuals trained and equipped by the Soviets make their way into strictly terrorist groups with little revolutionary potential.

Moscow maintains close relations with and furnishes aid to governments and organizations that directly support terrorist groups. In the Middle East, for example, the Soviets sell large quantities of arms to Libya. The Soviets also back a number of Palestinian groups that openly conduct terrorist operations. In Latin America, the Soviet Union and Cuba appear to be pursuing a long-term coordinated campaign to establish sympathetic Latin American regimes. The Cubans, and more recently the Soviets, clearly support organizations and groups in Latin America that use terrorism as a basic technique to undermine existing regimes. In other parts of the world, especially Africa, the Soviets have supported guerrilla movements and national liberation organizations that engage in terrorism.

Libya. Support of terrorist groups has been an element of Libya's foreign policy under Qadhafi since the mid-1970s. Qadhafi has been linked by overwhelming evidence to terrorist attacks and assassinations in Western Europe, the United States, and the Middle East and is known to support terrorist groups and liberation movements worldwide. After the Gulf of Sidra incident, when the United States shot down two Libyan fighters which were attacking U.S. naval forces in international waters, Qadhafi threatened to assassinate President Reagan and other senior U.S. Government officials. The 1981 records contain information on 13 attacks by Libyan assassination squads.

South Yemen. The Government of the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen has supported international terrorism since the late 1960s. It provides camps and other training facilities for a number of leftist terrorist groups.

The Government of South Yemen has not participated directly in international terrorist attacks, however, and South Yemeni citizens have been involved in only six incidents since 1968.

Syria. As a major supporter of radical Palestinian groups, Syria has provided training, logistic support, and use of diplomatic facilities to groups that are willing to do its bidding. Syria supports Palestinian elements that engage in international terrorism, including the BJO, which targets moderate Palestinian leaders as well as Israeli interests.

Iraq. During the past 3 years, the Iraqi Government has reduced support to non-Palestinian terrorists and placed restrictions on many Palestinian groups, moving closer to its moderate Arab neighbors.

Iran. Despite its radical, anti-Western policies, its support for Islamic fundamentalists, and widespread government terrorism within Iran, the Khomeini regime provides only limited support to international terrorist groups. U.S. records list 24 international terrorist attacks carried out directly by the Iranian Government in 1980 and five in 1981. All of the attacks in 1981 occurred in Beirut and were directed primarily against Iraqi diplomats. Most Iranian-sponsored attacks on Iraqi targets in Lebanon not undertaken by the Iranian Government were carried out by Lebanese Shiite militia members.

Cuba. Havana openly supports and advocates armed revolution as the only means for leftist forces to gain power in Latin America. Cuba also supports organizations and groups in Latin America that use terrorism to undermine existing regimes. The Cubans have played an important role in facilitating the movement of men and weapons into Central and South America, providing direct support in the form of training, arms, safe havens, and advice to a wide variety of guerrilla groups.

¹These groups were more active in the early 1970s.

U.S. Business as a Target

Types of Attacks

International terrorists have used almost every type of violence against U.S. business personnel and facilities, ranging from telephone threats to murder. The United States has recorded 645 bombings, 61 kidnappings, 29 assassination attempts, and 23 armed attacks since January 1968.

Bombing. This is a preferred terrorist method in part because explosives are relatively easy to obtain, difficult to trace, and normally involve little personal risk to the perpetrators. This common type of attack occurred in 38 countries—the greatest number in Argentina, Iran, Italy, and Mexico. While almost 70% of all incidents recorded were bombings, the majority of them did not cause significant damage.

Seizure. Since 1968 there have been 94 attacks in which U.S. business personnel were taken hostage against the satisfaction of monetary or political demands. Almost two-thirds of these seizures were kidnappings, but such incidents also included skyjackings and hostage-barricade situations. The largest annual total of kidnappings and hostage seizures was 21 in 1981, almost four times the annual average for the 1968-81 period. Almost 60% of them occurred in Latin America, with the greatest number of incidents in Argentina, Guatemala, and Colombia. Financial demands were most often made for the release of the hostages, but other ultimatums included the release of imprisoned terrorists, publicity for a political statement, and/or a safe getaway for the captors. In over 75% of the hostage takings, the terrorists were able to achieve at least some of their demands.

Assassination. Although handgun assassinations of U.S. business representatives overseas are rare, they attract media attention, require a response from the local government, and have a strong impact on local business operations. Most incidents of this type have taken place in Argentina and Guatemala.

Types of Companies Targeted

The U.S. companies that have been the targets of terrorism range from well-known giants of international business to small enterprises. They included oil companies (Chevron, Mobil, Exxon, Gulf, and Texaco), banks and financial enterprises (Chase Manhattan, Chemical Bank of New York, Bankers Trust, Citibank, Bank of America, and American Express), and companies associated in the public mind with the "American way of life" (Coca-Cola, Pepsi-Cola, Colgate-Palmolive, Ford, Chrysler, Macy's, Sears Roebuck, and McDonald's). Slightly less popular targets were airlines (Pan American), engineering firms (Bechtel), agricultural equipment companies (John Deere), and high-technology enterprises (IBM, Burroughs, and Honeywell).

Incidents Resulting in Casualties

Attacks that cause casualties are almost always perpetrated by experienced terrorist organizations, provoke a response from the highest levels of government and corporate management, and command worldwide media attention.

The United States recorded 144 terrorist attacks on U.S. business personnel in 1968-81 that caused injuries or death. Such incidents occurred in 31 countries, mostly Argentina, Iran, the United States, the Philippines, Mexico, and Guatemala. Sixty terrorist groups claimed credit. Bombings and assassinations accounted for 75% of the attacks resulting in casualties.

Location of Incidents

Since 1968 incidents of international terrorism against U.S. business personnel and facilities have occurred in 56 countries, more than 40% of them in only six countries. The greatest number were in Argentina, primarily because the Montoneros routinely targeted U.S. business interests during the early and mid-1970s. In the United States and Italy, the attacks were usually carried out by foreign terrorists, while in Argentina, Iran, Mexico, and Guatemala, the incidents were almost always the work of indigenous groups. Terrorist groups in Latin America carried out attacks as symbolic action against U.S. power, wealth, and influence in the region or in an attempt to undermine the local regime.

As with all terrorist attacks, incidents involving U.S. business are often carried out where they will receive the most publicity, and the large urban areas of Western Europe provide the perfect setting.

International Terrorist Groups

A total of 98 terrorist groups have claimed credit for attacks against U.S. businesses during the past 14 years. The Montoneros have claimed more responsibility than any other group.

The People's Revolutionary Army (Argentina) also conducted numerous attacks during the mid-1970s, but this group has not carried out an attack against U.S. business since 1976. ■

Terrorist Target: The Diplomat

(Department of State)

The worldwide terrorism phenomenon of the past decade and a half has impacted most severely on our Western democratic societies. The brutal tactics of terrorist groups, whether from the far left or right, have served to erode democratic institutions and civil liberties in many parts of the world. Democracies have found it difficult to cope with the tactics of terrorism and in some cases have been tempted to respond by a turn to authoritarian political structures. Terrorism also has adversely impacted diplomatic relations between nations—even friendly ones.

Attacks on the Rise

In Beirut the French Ambassador is gunned down by terrorists. Several months later, a French employee of the embassy and his pregnant wife are found shot to death in their apartment. A car bomb explodes in the French Embassy compound killing 12 and injuring 25. Turkish officials are killed in Los Angeles and Boston and another is wounded in Ottawa. The Turkish Consulate in Paris is seized. The U.S. Charge in Paris narrowly escapes assassination.

An Israeli attache is assassinated in Paris only 3 months after an American military attache is shot to death while on his way to the embassy. In London the Israeli Ambassador lies critically wounded in the hospital after being shot through the head by a terrorist. In Guatemala the Brazilian Embassy is seized. These are only some of the more recent examples of growing terrorist attacks against diplomats.

The dramatic worldwide increase in both the number and seriousness of terrorist attacks against diplomatic personnel and facilities during the past decade has adversely affected the conduct of diplomacy. In 1970 there were 213 attacks on diplomats from 31 countries. By 1980 this number had risen to 409 attacks on diplomats from 60 countries—an increase of almost 100%. The number of attacks on diplomats as a percentage of total terrorist attacks has also increased from 30% in 1975 to 54% in 1980. Unfortunately this trend exhibits no sign of abating.

World attention has focused on the fact that diplomacy has become a high-risk profession. Some 20 ambassadors from 12 countries have been assassinated (including five U.S. Ambassadors—more than the number of U.S. generals killed in the Vietnam war). Between 1968 and mid-1981 there were 370 international terrorist attacks which caused death or personal injury. During 1980 alone, there were 50 such incidents, more than in any previous year. All together, 381 diplomats have been killed and 824 wounded between 1968 and 1982. Even more ominously, assassination attempts, which have been increasing steadily over the past 10 years, reached an alltime high in 1980. The number of kidnappings and hostage barricade situations has also increased. Bombings are still the most frequent form of attack, however, since they involve little risk of capture to the terrorist, and explosives can be acquired fairly easily.

The number of groups carrying out terrorist attacks has also grown almost every year. Since 1968 a total of 102 terrorist groups have claimed responsibility for terrorist attacks. In all, diplomats from 108 countries have been victims of attacks, and the embassies of 38 countries have been seized by terrorists. The level of violence of attacks has also increased.

During the early years of the 1970s the terrorist threat to diplomats was primarily from low-level, small-scale violence. In recent years we have also witnessed an increase in mob violence. Between 1970 and 1980 there were some 70 forcible incursions into diplomatic facilities. However, more than 50% of these occurred after the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, which suggests that the success achieved there created a model for other terrorist groups to emulate. The potential dangers of such acts were borne out when 39 people, including several Spanish diplomats, were killed when the Spanish Embassy in Guatemala was seized in 1980.

Why the Diplomat?

All terrorist attacks involve the use of violence for purposes of political extortion, coercion, and publicity for a political cause. The terrorist uses his victims as tools to achieve these goals, regardless of the fact that those targeted are rarely directly associated with the area of political conflict. Although some may argue that attacks against diplomats are senseless, in the mind of the terrorist it is a calculated act with deliberate political goals and objectives.

Diplomats are highly visible and desirable targets for several reasons, including their symbolic value and the psychological impact created. Attacks against diplomats evoke a response from the highest levels of two governments—that of the diplomat attacked and that of the host country. Terrorists are also able to command worldwide media attention for the duration of the incident. Terrorist groups single out diplomats perhaps because they perceive that in order to obtain the publicity they seek, they must strike at these increasingly more visible and symbolic targets.

Terrorist attacks on diplomats almost always are perpetrated by well-trained and experienced terrorist organizations. These groups are well organized and are seeking specific political goals. For example, two Armenian terrorist groups have conducted a campaign of terror directed against Turkish diplomats in revenge for alleged atrocities which were committed over 60 years ago. Some 20 Turkish diplomats and members of their families have been killed in recent years by Armenian terrorists in numerous countries, for example in Spain, where in 1978 the Turkish Ambassador's wife, her brother, and their chauffeur were killed. We in the United States have not been immune to the violence perpetrated by Armenian terrorist organizations. In January of this year the Turkish Consul General in Los Angeles was gunned down and the honorary Turkish Consul in Boston was murdered in a similar fashion in early May. Earlier a car bomb was detonated in front of the Turkish U.N. mission injuring several people.

An Increasing Toll

Terrorism unfortunately has taken its toll on state-to-state relations. Relations between countries can be adversely affected if one country believes that another is failing to provide adequate protection to its diplomats or to live up to its responsibilities. For example, Franco-Turkish and Franco-Spanish relations have suffered because of a perceived laxity in French prosecution and extradition of terrorists. The Dominican Republic Embassy seizure in Bogota in 1980 by the April 19th Movement (M-19), in which 15 senior diplomats were held for 61 days, caused considerable strains in relations between the Government of Colombia and some of the countries whose ambassadors were held hostage. The recent slayings of Turkish officials in the United States interject strain in an otherwise close U.S.-Turkish relationship.

Also, sponsorship of terrorist acts by one country against another can seriously disrupt diplomatic intercourse and normal relations. Last year, for example, Colombia suspended diplomatic relations with Cuba because of its training in Cuba of Colombian M-19 terrorists. One of the principal reasons for expelling Libyan representatives from Washington was the continuing support by the Qadhafi regime to international terrorist activities, including those directed against U.S. officials. U.S. relations with other countries and groups have been adversely affected by their sponsorship of acts of international terrorism, such as the Letelier assassination in Washington carried out by Chilean agents and the continued resort to international terrorism by various elements of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). The disastrous effects of the seizure of American diplomats on U.S.-Iranian relations need no further elaboration.

Countries whose diplomats have been victimized represent a wide range of ideologies, geographic locations, sizes, and wealth. However, all attacks on diplomats have one element in common: All terrorist attacks are acts of political violence. The terrorist is seeking to redress a political grievance, overthrow a political system, or publicize a political point of view. I was a firsthand witness to the events in Bogota which occurred when the M-19 held diplomats from 15 countries hostage in the Embassy of the Dominican Republic for 61 days, demanding publicity for their cause, freedom for imprisoned members of their organization, and ransom. Although the Government of Colombia did not accede to the major terrorist demands, the terrorists did obtain widespread publicity for their cause. A relatively obscure terrorist organization was suddenly catapulted into the international spotlight and thereby increased greatly its prominence within Colombia and internationally.

It is the symbolism of the individual terrorist act, and not necessarily the act itself, which gives it significance. The terrorist uses the act to make a political statement to the target (which is not the

His most recent overseas service was in Brussels as the Political Adviser to the U.S. Mission to NATO and in Geneva as the State Department member of the SALT II delegation with the rank of minister. Earlier he served as a member of the Department of State's Policy Planning Staff and as an office director in the Bureau of Intelligence and Research. victim) and to the world at large. Thus, U.S. diplomats who were held in Tehran for 444 days were used as pawns to advance political objectives internally of the group that held them as well as to achieve objectives with regard to the U.S. Government and to the rest of the world.

While the functions of representation, negotiation, and intelligence gathering continue, embassies are now conducting diplomacy in the face of an increasingly violent environment under conditions never before experienced. The level of security surrounding diplomatic personnel and facilities has been increased to unprecedented levels in an attempt to deter terrorist attacks. As embassy security has become more stringent, it has become more difficult to conduct diplomatic business in a normal fashion. Many embassies now resemble military installations, surrounded by high walls and barbed wire. Buildings are equipped with automatic tear gas dispensers, ballistic glass, and closed-circuit TV. Visitors are searched and made to pass through metal detectors under the scrutiny of armed guards. Embassy personnel are often transported in armored vehicles.

The cost of protecting diplomats abroad has also soared. The Department of State now spends annually about 14% (around $140 million) of its entire budget on security, and this figure has been rising steadily. This is in addition to protection provided to U.S. diplomatic facilities and personnel overseas by host governments which would cost us an additional $200 million annually if the U.S. Government had to provide it.

While precautions are certainly necessary, the effect has been a reduction in access and a corresponding reduction in the level of communications between diplomats and the host country, in particular, the people of the country. Diplomats are finding it increasingly difficult to function well in this environment.

Enhanced Security Measures

In 1980, for the first time since 1968 when the U.S. Government first began keeping statistics on terrorism, U.S. diplomats surpassed U.S. businessmen

Security Enhancement Program

A dimension has been added to the problem of securing U.S. Embassies in the 1980s—the need to cope with the threat of mob violence. The Department of State's security enhancement program must be aimed at preventing U.S. Embassies from being destroyed, personnel taken hostage or killed, and national security information compromised. Security planning must take into account the possibility that the host government will not provide meaningful protection before the attack or send timely relief during the attack but may even encourage, support, or sponsor the hostile action. Public access controls alone are not sufficient to deny rapid mob penetration into buildings.

In addition to the threat of overt action, U.S. diplomatic installations must be recognized as prime targets of espionage activity by hostile intelligence services. Surreptitious entry into a mission is a constant threat, as is the danger of the placement of electronic surveillance equipment.

The main thrust of the security enhancement program is to establish, at those posts considered most threatened, an environment that will provide the greatest possible degree of safety and security—control barriers; guards and receptionists; bullet-resistant materials, electronically operated locks, alarms, and communications equipment; package inspection equipment, defensive equipment, and closed circuit TV; perimeter protection in the form of fences, walls, and gates; lighting; reinforcement of entrances, windows, walls, and other exterior features of the building; internal controls; tear gas systems; safe havens which are fire resistant and resist forced penetrations; fire safety equipment; and emergency power and destruction equipment.

Initially proposed as a 5-year program which would cost approximately $200 million, the Congress appropriated a total of $42 million for FY 1980 and 1981. Additional appropriations have been requested of $25 million each for FY 1982 and 1983. Improvements at several posts have already been completed. Major security improvements are to be made at a total of 70 of the most threatened U.S. diplomatic missions, and significant steps are being taken on security at another 55 posts. ■ as the most frequent victims of terrorist attacks overseas, in spite of the fact that U.S. businessmen greatly outnumber U.S. diplomats. To deal with this problem, the United States has undertaken a rigorous campaign to enhance the security of our personnel and facilities overseas. Primarily we are attempting to reduce the vulnerability of our diplomatic missions by constructing perimeter defenses, building secure safe-havens to which staff can retreat in the event of an attack, improving access controls, and installing nonlethal entry denial systems. Other protective measures involve added guards, armored cars, and the like. All State Department employees are also required to attend a seminar on "Coping with Violence Abroad" in order to make them aware of security problems and educate them on how to reduce their vulnerability. Intelligence collection and analysis on terrorist groups has been accorded a much higher priority and has paid off in terms of alerting us to possible attacks against our diplomatic personnel and facilities.

Need for International Cooperation

If we are to deal more effectively with this problem over the long run, better international cooperation will be required. While diplomats from the United States, Israel, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, Cuba, and Turkey have been the most frequent targets, terrorism is a complex and universal problem shared by all nations of the world. Virtually no state has been left unaffected by terrorism. Nations must work together to take steps to deter and prevent terrorist violence from escalating. Such necessary steps include a greater exchange of information on terrorists and their movements, tighter controls on the movement of weapons and explosives, and more efficient extradition procedures for accused terrorists.

The international community must also develop a consensus that acts of terrorism should be outlawed and that those who commit them should be brought to justice. The international community took a major step in this regard in 1973 when it adopted the U.N. Convention on the Prevention and

Terrorism and the Foreign Service

In 1981 more than 13,000 people took the written examination for entry into the Foreign Service—about 1,000 more than in 1980. The number of applicants for the 1982 exam, to be given in December, indicates that the numbers will continue to increase. Despite the fact that the U.S. diplomat is a prime target of international terrorists, thousands of talented and able young Americans have not been deterred from seeking a career in the Foreign Service.

Terrorism is, however, a fact of life for those in the service. Families may not accompany employees to some diplomatic posts because of the danger of terrorism. It may be too dangerous to travel in certain areas of other countries because of the threat of terrorism. Obviously assignments to such posts are not always desired—but the posts are staffed.

Foreign Service personnel understand that they are members of a disciplined service and agree that they will serve where they are needed. In addition efforts are made to compensate them for the dangers. They may receive as much as 25% additional pay for assignments to designated high-risk areas. They also benefit from the protection of the Department's security program.

The Department of State recognizes its obligation to provide the most effective representation abroad of the interests of the United States, regardless of terrorism or any other obstacle. ■

"Coping With Violence Abroad"

Most U.S. Government civilian employees serving abroad share one common experience—attendance at the Department of State's seminar on "Coping With Violence Abroad." Presented by the Department's Foreign Service Institute 37 times annually, it attracted more than 3,000 persons in 1981; attendance in 1982 certainly will be higher.

The seminar represents a program which has been in effect since the early 1970s. At that time, when terrorism was first recognized as a problem for U.S. Government operations abroad, the State Department sent mobile training teams to a number of diplomatic posts to brief employees on techniques to minimize the risk of becoming a victim of terrorist acts. The Department then developed a 1-day program in Washington, "The Terrorism Course," for its employees going overseas. That program evolved into a 2-day seminar on "Coping With Violence Abroad" in January 1981.

Early in 1982 it was determined that the seminar could be presented more effectively by splitting it into two parts. One day (in Washington) addresses problems of general concern, such as government policy with regard to terrorism, the effect of terrorism on families, surveillance recognition, hostage survival, and explosive devices. The second segment, to be in operation by October 1982, will be taken at the employee's post and will deal with more specific problems in the particular area using video cassette training aids prepared by the Foreign Service Institute. This new approach is designed to give new arrivals (all U.S. Government employees and their adult families, regardless of parent agency) at the 253 Foreign Service posts useful information directly related to circumstances where they live and work.

In its various forms, the seminar has been taken by more than 5,000 people. Their comments and reactions have been a major impetus to the continuing reappraisal of the seminar from the point of view of both form and content. A number of persons who took the course and later found themselves in a terrorist situation have stated that they found the information they received in the seminar to have been particularly helpful. Those of the hostages held in Tehran who had taken some version of the earlier course reported that they remembered vividly hostage survival techniques and stated that the information was beneficial to them during their captivity. ■

Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons, Including Diplomatic Agents, commonly referred to as the New York convention. Adhering states must either extradite or prosecute persons alleged to have committed violations of the convention. The convention's effectiveness, however, has been hampered by the fact that only 53 nations have ratified it.

Recognition of the problem has continued with the adoption of the 1979 U.N. Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, which now has been ratified by 17 nations; 22 ratifications are required before the convention enters into force. In 1980 the General Assembly adopted a Resolution on Measures to Enhance the Protection, Security and Safety of Diplomatic and Consular Missions and Representatives, which was reaffirmed last year.

The New York convention and other international agreements relating to the protection of diplomatic personnel and premises are steps in the right direction of establishing an international consensus and body of law outlawing crimes against diplomats. However, they must be strengthened and built on to establish norms of behavior by seeking to discourage nations who would condone and support terrorists and terrorism and to encourage nations to take more seriously their obligations to protect diplomats.

Obligation of Nations

All nations have an obligation to provide protection for diplomats accredited to them. The universally accepted Vienna convention requires states to "take all appropriate steps to prevent attack" on the "person, freedom or dignity" of foreign diplomatic and consular personnel. A violation of this obligation, regardless of the cause, is always disturbing. Of particular concern, however, is state complicity or acquiescence in acts of terrorism directed against diplomatic personnel and facilities. State-sponsored and -supported terrorism, whatever the target, is the most egregious form of terrorism. But when the target is the representative of another country, the act takes on an entirely new dimension and we see an erosion of the principle of diplomatic inviolability.

The Libyan Government is one which has engaged in targeting for violence the diplomats of other countries, specifically the United States. For example, the Government of Libya was behind the sacking of the U.S. Embassy in Tripoli. Last November, Sudanese authorities successfully thwarted a Libyan plot to plant explosive devices in the American Club in Khartoum. The bombs, consisting of two stereo speakers each packed with 20 kilograms of plastic explosives, were intended to explode on a weekend evening when the club would be filled with the families of U.S. Em-

Department of State Security Program

The operational arm of the Department of State against terrorism is the Office of Security. Its primary function is to provide protective security for the personnel and facilities of the agency and the Foreign Service in the United States and abroad and for the protection of certain high-level foreign dignitaries. (Protection of visiting chiefs of state and heads of government is the responsibility of the Secret Service.)

The Office of Security is headed by a Deputy Assistant Secretary, assisted in Washington by a deputy director and four assistant directors. The Deputy Assistant Secretary is assisted abroad by associate directors in specific geographical regions.

Domestic Concerns

Domestic Operations Division plans and administers security programs designed to protect the property and personnel of the Department of State. It conducts security surveys on buildings (guards, alarm systems, access control systems, and closed circuit TV systems); makes arrangements for high-level diplomatic functions, conferences, news events, and high-level visits to the Department of State; oversees preparation of contingency plans; conducts surveys of foreign diplomatic missions, as requested, and at the residences of certain high-ranking State Department officials; and investigates any threats or incidents that occur within the Department or Foreign Service buildings.

Marine Corps guards are vital elements to the security of U.S. diplomatic missions.

Secretary's Detail is responsible for the protection of the Secretary of State anywhere in the world. It is also responsible for the protection of his residence(s) and family, as required.

Dignitary Protection Division provides protection to foreign dignitaries (other than chiefs of state or heads of government) and their families while they are visiting the United States. It also protects selected U.S. officials traveling or assigned abroad, including certain ambassadors in high-threat areas. (The protection of foreign consular personnel in the United States would become an added duty of this division under legislation now pending before the Congress. The legislation would authorize the Department to reimburse State or local police when they are requested to provide extraordinary protection to foreign consular personnel. The Secret Service now provides protection for foreign diplomats stationed in Washington, D.C., and, under an arrangement between the Secret Service and the New York City Police Department, the latter provides protection to diplomatic missions in New York City on a reimbursable basis.)

Command Center has two functional sections which provide a 24-hour, 7-day-a-week emergency operations center, communications to and from protective details, a worldwide security communications network, and threat assessment capability. (1) The Watch Officer Group disseminates intelligence information concerning potential terrorist activities or other threats directed against U.S. Government employees or installations, coordinates protective detail movements throughout the Washington, D.C., area, and provides details with threat-related intelligence concerning the people under protection. (2) The Threat Analysis Group researches and analyzes intelligence produced by the U.S. intelligence and counterintelligence communities and monitors terrorist activities and related security problems. It also provides intelligence assessments for security planning, selection of preventive and protective measures, and overall security decisionmaking.

Protective Liaison maintains liaison with local, State, and Federal law enforcement and intelligence agencies and the foreign diplomatic and consular corps. It also conducts physical security surveys of foreign diplomatic facilities, when requested, and protective security briefings for foreign dignitaries and security personnel; notifies the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) and the U.S. Customs Service of the travel of foreign dignitaries, particularly if they are accompanied by armed security personnel; and arranges for the special security needs of foreign diplomatic missions arising from threats, incidents, or official diplomatic functions.

Overseas Operations

Foreign Operations Division develops and implements security programs for the protection of personnel, property, and classified and controlled information at U.S. Foreign Service posts. This includes coordinating post security programs; serving as the point of contact for the regional security officers; reviewing and critiquing emergency planning documents, security surveys, and serious incident reports; and preparing briefings for ambassadors and other senior U.S. Government personnel. It also supervises the U.S. Navy Seabees and the Marine security guards.

Regional Security Officers formulate contingency plans to cope with bomb threats, acts of terrorism, riots and demonstrations, and internal defense; conducts security surveys of official office buildings and residences; provides protective services for potential targets of terrorist organizations, maintaining liaison with local and U.S. law enforcement and intelligence authorities; conducts counterterrorist training and indoctrination programs; and provides operational supervision of the Marine security guards.

Marine Security Guards are enlisted members of the U.S. Marine Corps who are specifically selected and trained for duty at

(International Communication Agency)

U.S. diplomatic posts. There are presently 119 Marine security guards detachments located throughout the world. Their primary function is the protection of personnel, property, and classified material. They are also responsible for controlling access by the public to those diplomatic or consular establishments, often using sophisticated technical equipment; for serving as key members of a post's internal defense team; and for maintaining control of emergency communications networks, particularly after normal office hours.

Seabees (U.S. Navy Construction Personnel) are assigned to the Department of State to perform surveillance over construction work and for performing maintenance and construction in sensitive areas.

Technical Services Division plans and administers programs related to the technical defense of Foreign Service establishments against electronic penetration, surreptitious entry, and terrorist attack (utilizing security equipment such as alarms, closed circuit TV systems, locking hardware and remote-controlled locking systems, bullet-resistant materials, intercom systems, metal detectors, package inspection, document destruction equipment, tear gas dispensing systems, and other special protective equipment). It also provides the expertise to formulate policy for technical and physical security, weapons, and personnel protective measures.

Armed Department of State security agents accompany U.S. Ambassador Deane Hinton in El Salvador.

Security Enhancement Group provides continuity for all physical security improvements to be made under the security enhancement program. In general it provides trained and experienced personnel for the survey teams that determine what is needed and make recommendations for improvement, develops and tests improved physical security materials and equipment, establishes physical security standards, and coordinates with other offices of the Department concerning these projects.

Education and Training Staff conducts counterterrorism courses for security professionals and other U.S. Government employees, including terrorism, hostage negotiations, and hostage rescue operations; the senior officers counterterrorism briefing; firearms training; counterterrorism, security enhancement, investigations, and guard forces; dignitary protection; and instruction for foreign national guard forces, chauffeurs, and police escorts on dignitary protection, firearms, explosives recognition and emergency response, and emergency driving techniques. It also provides professional training to new special agents of the Office of Security, regional security officers, Marine security guards, and Seabees and is a major contributor to the Department's seminar on "Coping With Violence Abroad." ■

bassy staff and other Americans. Bombs of this size could have completely destroyed the club, killing or maiming scores of people, including third-country diplomats who use the club. We know that these devices were prepared by Libyan intelligence officers assigned to a Libyan People's Bureau in a neighboring country and that a Libyan intelligence officer personally insured that the bombs were loaded on a flight to Khartoum.

Outlook

This is a bleak picture of the current situation regarding diplomats and terrorism. What can be done to alleviate this problem? The problem is one of increasing intensity and the future, unfortunately, does not look any brighter. Attacks on diplomats have proven to be extremely cost effective for the amount of worldwide attention they generate and for that reason they are likely to continue.

Obviously, we will have to continue to do more of what we have been doing (e.g., more and better intelligence and more effective security measures and procedures), although one eventually reaches the point of diminishing returns. At the same time, like-minded nations must intensify ways of improving cooperation among themselves with a view to reducing the disruption caused by terrorism to international relations and stability, particularly with regard to the protection of diplomatic premises and staff.

Governments which sponsor or condone acts of terrorism against diplomats must be made to understand that such conduct will not be tolerated by the international community. Likewise, everything possible must be done to bring to justice swiftly those perpetrators of heinous crimes against the civilized world. The challenge of preventing attacks against diplomats and the disruption of diplomatic intercourse must be a topic high on the agenda of the world community. ■

Guidelines for U.S. Government Employees Taken Hostage

U.S. Government personnel serving abroad are expected to be mature, responsible, and patriotic individuals for whom the concept of service has a real and personal meaning.

Individuals who are taken hostage should be aware that their captors may seek to exploit them. Their captors may be seeking information to be used to the detriment of the United States or of their fellow hostages, and are likely to use information obtained from one captive when interrogating another. Individuals should consequently be guided by the knowledge that whatever they say may be used to mislead or punish their colleagues and that their actions may result in reprisals.

Captured individuals should not discuss sensitive aspects of the work of their fellow hostages. They should not divulge classified or sensitive information. They should not sign or make statements or take actions which they believe might bring discredit to the United States.

The decision to attempt escape rests with the individual concerned. However, the decision should be consistent with the considerations set above.

Hard and fast rules are not always helpful, and the U.S. Government recognizes that the ability of individuals to resist extreme pressure differs. But to the extent possible one must help one's colleagues and avoid exploitation. Sound judgment is essential.
